

THE KNAVE'S REGRET

A Vhasian Expansion for Fate's Edge

Set down in the canton of Rouen, by the Silent Stair

“When the armor closes, the heart must open—or break.”

Under the lamp, bread and salt — and a song for the armor-bound.

Year of the Broken Lance, 847 AR

For the knight who unbuckled his gorget to hear a boy's voice.

For the Cantor who carries the silence between notes.

For the chivalry that outlives the peace.

The Cantor's Vigil

THE bells of Rouen ring differently now. In the cantons beyond the walls, where the ducal forests meet the Ethorian marches, they ring for jousts and for the binding of seasonal oaths. Within the city, they ring for markets and marriages. But in the Chapel of the Silent Stair, where Cantor Alain keeps his vigil, the bells are muffled, wrapped in felt, so that the resonance does not disturb the dead.

Alain has returned to Vhasia after twenty years on the Cantor's road. He has sung for barons in their drafty halls and for charcoal-burners in their smoke-hollows. He has taken into his flesh the Corruption of his Patron—not as punishment, but as translation. His voice carries harmonics that make candles weep wax. His shadow, when the sun is low, moves a half-step behind his heels. He has feathers, fine as down, growing from his temples that he hides beneath a scholar's cap.

He touches the silver ring on his thumb—not silver anymore, but silver fused to bone, the metal cracked and the crack widened by time into a canyon that pulses with his heartbeat. He is about to sing the Planctus Armatus, the Lament for the Armored, a Cantor's rite that remembers Sir Corin, who unbuckled his gorget to hear a thief's voice and was destroyed by the mercy he offered.

The song is not for the knight's death. It is for the moment before—when the armor opened, and the man inside reached out.

The Province Wars had not yet ended when Sir Corin found the boy. The duchies of Vhasia were fracturing along ancient fault-lines: Ethor against Adria, the Ethorian marches against the central cantons, each duke claiming the sunburst shield while the peasantry burned the fields to keep them from quartering armies. Rouen was a loyalist city then, holding for the Crown while the provinces fell away like scales from a wounded serpent.

Corin had ridden from the rout at the Black Ford, where the Bulwark of the North had fallen not to treachery but to arithmetic—too many spears, not enough stone. He had ridden through the ash-grey morning, his armor still caked with the mud of the ford, his sword hand cramped from gripping. He was forty years old, a knight of the Ethor canton, sworn to a Crown that had forgotten his name.

He found the boy in a burned orchard, looting the body of a cook. The boy was twelve, humming something tuneless as he worked the dead man's ring from his thumb.

"Stand," Corin said.

The boy stood. The ring came free. Corin saw the theft and saw, beneath it, the hunger. The Province Wars had made thieves of honest men, but this was a child.

"I should hang you," Corin said. He meant it. He had hanged men for less—deserters, looters, those who broke the chivalric code that was the only law left in the fractured duchies.

But the boy sang.

It was not a song Corin knew. It was Ethorian, perhaps, or older—a ballad of the Barde de Fer, the Knight of Iron who forgot his lady's face because his visor was always down. The boy sang it a cappella, his voice clear and untrained, rising from the soot like a lark from a burned field. He sang of the knight who unbuckled his gorget to feel the rain and was struck by an arrow in the throat, who died smiling because he had felt the water.

Corin listened. His armor was heavy. It had been heavy for twenty years, but he had stopped noticing until this moment, this song. He realized he had not seen his own face in a mirror, unhelmed, in months. He realized he did not remember the color of his wife's eyes, only the shape of her letters, which he read by lantern-light through his visor.

"Who taught you that?" Corin asked.

"No one," the boy said. "I made it. For the cook. He was kind."

Corin loosened the twine. Not enough to free, but enough to let the blood move. "Walk," he said. "And sing if you must. The road to Rouen is long, and the armor grows heavier with every mile."

Rouen was a city of bells and fractures. The loyalist governor held the citadel, but the lower town was a maze of competing jurisdictions—ducal law, canton law, the law of the sword. Corin brought the boy to the empty courthouse, meaning to fulfill his oath of justice, but the magistrate had fled to Adria, and the seals were broken.

The boy watched Corin's face crumble. "There is no law," the boy said. "Only the armor. Only the song."

Corin drew his dagger. The boy did not flinch. But Corin cut the twine, and in that cutting, he unbuckled something in himself. He had kept the chivalric code like a gorget, tight against the throat, and now he loosened it to breathe.

THE CANTOR'S VIGIL

"Stay," Corin said. "Help me hold the walls. Help me remember what the armor is for."

The boy stayed. His name was Alain. He carried water. He sang.

The siege came seven days later. The provincial forces, seeing the loyalist standard still flying, determined to raze Rouen as an example. They brought rams and fire. Corin stood at the south gate, his armor buckled now not for show but for survival, and he fought.

But he had changed. He had unbuckled his mercy, and he could not buckle it closed again. He spared a provincial soldier who begged for his life. He opened the postern to refugees when the governor ordered it sealed. He became, in the eyes of the loyalist command, unreliable.

On the seventh day, when the gate fell, Corin was not at the barricade. He was in the square, helping Alain carry a wounded child to the chapel. The provincial spears found him there, unhelmed, his gorget open, his face turned to the sky.

He died smiling. Alain sang him out—the Planctus, the first time it was ever sung—and the song was so beautiful that the provincial soldiers paused in their looting to listen.

Then they burned the chapel.

Now, forty years later, Alain sings in the rebuilt chapel. The Province Wars are ended, technically, though the duchies still raid each other and the Crown is more theory than practice. Rouen is prosperous. The jousts have returned to the fields beyond the walls. Knights wear armor polished like mirrors and tilt for the favor of ladies whose names they remember, because the peace allows memory.

But Alain knows—knows in his changed flesh, in the feathers that shed when he sings the high notes, in the shadow that moves independently when the moon is full—that the disconnect remains. The knights buckle their gorgets tight. The chivalry is performance. The mercy is scripted. And beneath the jousts and the romance, the old fractures wait, breathing in their iron shells.

He sings the Planctus Armatus. The congregation weeps, not for Corin, who is forty years dead, but for the beauty of the voice. They do not hear the warning. They do not know that Alain sings not for the past but for the future, for the moment when the armor must open again or shatter.

The song ends. Alain touches the cracked ring on his thumb. It pulses. The peace is old. The armor is polished. But he can hear, beneath the prosperity, the creak of metal tightening, the snap of buckles being secured, the silence of hearts choosing protection over connection.

He bows. He leaves. His shadow follows a half-step behind.

This chronicle was compiled from the Cantor's testimony, from the armorer's marks on Corin's breastplate (now in the Rouen museum), and from the Ethorian ballads of the marches, which remember what the cantons forget.

— Dusana of the Raven Road, Rouen, 847 AR

THE CANTOR'S VIGIL

Contents

The Cantor's Vigil	3
1 Introduction: The Fractured Cantons	11
1.1 The Nature of Vhasian Chivalry	12
1.2 What You Need	12
1.2.1 Core Clocks	12
2 The Cantons of Vhasia	15
2.1 The Ethor Canton	15
2.2 The Adria Palatinate	15
2.3 The Ethorian Marches	15
2.4 Rouen: The Hub City	16
3 Factions of the Fracture	17
3.1 The Order of the Iron Gorget	17
3.2 The Cantor's Road	17
3.3 The Ethorian Groves	17
3.4 The Ducal Courts	18
4 The Armor and the Song	19
4.1 The Ethorian Ballad of the Iron Bard	19
4.2 Corin's Choice	19
5 Patrons of the Armored	21
5.1 Mykkiel, the Judge of the Scar	21
5.2 Ikasha, She Who Sleeps in the Armor	21

CONTENTS

6	The Knight's Legacy: New Talents	23
6.1	The Unbuckled Gorget (Minor, 4 XP) . . .	23
6.2	The Iron Bard's Burden (Major, 8 XP) . . .	23
6.3	The Regret That Remains (Prestige, 12 XP) .	23
7	The Joust and the Raid	25
7.1	The Setup	25
7.2	The Endings	25
8	Appendix: The Chivalric Ledger	27
8.1	The Five Gestes of Vhasian Chivalry	27
8.2	Ethorian Folklore	27

Chapter I

Introduction: The Fractured Cantons

When the duke rides out, the peasant locks the door. When the duke rides in, the peasant burns the field. This is the chivalry of Vhasia—the armor that protects and isolates in equal measure.

— The Gray Wanderer, at the Ethorian marches

Vhasia is a land of jousts and jurisprudence, of chivalric romance and constant low war. Since the sundering of the old Crown, the great cantons have fractured into duchies, palatinates, and marcher lordships, each claiming the sunburst seal, each raiding its neighbors for tribute, hostages, and the acknowledgment of lineage.

In the high season, the land is peaceful enough for tourneys. Knights polish their armor until it mirrors the sky. They ride to the tilt for the favor of ladies whose sleeves they wear, reciting verses of courtly love while the peasantry watches from the lists. But beneath the romance runs the older current: the Ethorian marches where the forest law still holds, the barrow-kings who demand tribute in stories, the sacred groves where armor must be unbuckled or the trees will not witness the oath.

This expansion centers on the tragedy of Sir Corin and

CHAPTER 1. INTRODUCTION: THE FRACTURED CANTONS

the Cantor who witnessed it, but it expands to encompass the chivalric culture of Vhasia—the disconnect between the armored ideal and the unarmored heart.

1.1 The Nature of Vhasian Chivalry

The knights of Vhasia follow a code older than the Crown. It demands:

- Protection: To defend the weak, provided they are within the knight's canton.
- Courtesy: To honor all ladies, provided their lineage is suitable.
- Mercy: To spare the defeated, provided they swear homage.

The armor is the physical manifestation of this code—interlocking plates that separate the knight from the world. To unbuckle the gorget is to risk not only death but intimacy. Corin's tragedy was that he unbuckled at the wrong moment, for the wrong mercy, and the world was not gentle enough to receive it.

1.2 What You Need

Tier: Seasoned (41–90 XP) Players: 3–6 Length: 3–4 sessions

1.2.1 Core Clocks

- The Armor Closes [6] — Advances when knights choose protection over mercy, when gorgets are buckled tight, when chivalry becomes siege mentality. When full, the cantons close their borders and the raids become wars.

- The Song Escapes [8] — Advances when Cantors sing the truth, when mercy is shown, when armor is unbuckled. When full, a moment of connection occurs—but it may be fatal.
- The Fracture Widens [10] — Advances with every chivalric gesture that masks a brutal reality. When full, the Province Wars reignite.

CHAPTER I. INTRODUCTION: THE FRACTURED CANTONS

Chapter 2

The Cantons of Vhasia

2.1 The Ethor Canton

The loyalist heartland, where the old Crown still holds nominal sway. Its knights are stern, legalistic, devoted to the code. Corin was Ethorian. Their castles are stone, their forests hunted out, their chivalry a matter of record-keeping.

2.2 The Adria Palatinate

The southern canton, rich in wine and olive groves. Its knights are voluptuaries, lovers of poetry and song. They raid less for land than for hostages to ransom, for the drama of capture and release. Their chivalry is theatrical, performed.

2.3 The Ethorian Marches

The western forests, where the old ways hold. Here, knights must unbuckle their armor to enter the sacred groves. Here, the Barde de Fer ballads originate, warning of the knight who forgets his humanity. The marches are Vhasia's uncivilized heart, dangerous to armored men.

2.4 Rouen: The Hub City

Where the cantons meet and clash. Rouen is a city of inns and tourney fields, of law courts and Ethorian shrines. It is neutral ground by tradition, though neutrality is a luxury of the powerful. The Silent Stair chapel, where Alain sings, is built on the site of Corin's death.

Chapter 3

Factions of the Fracture

3.1 The Order of the Iron Gorget

A knightly order sworn to the ideal of total protection. They never unbuckle, never eat without helm, never touch skin to skin. They are fearsome in battle but increasingly isolated from the people they protect. Corin was once a member; he broke his vow when he spared Alain.

Strings: The Unbroken Seal (a gorget that has never opened), the Weight of Iron (inability to feel light touch), the Ledger of Mercies Refused.

3.2 The Cantor's Road

Not a faction but a calling. Cantors travel between cantons, singing the news, witnessing the truth. They are immune to chivalric protection but subject to its violence. Alain is the most famous of them, the one who survived Rouen.

Strings: The Cracked Ring, the Second Voice, the Metamorphosis of Witnessing.

3.3 The Ethorian Groves

The old religion of the marches, keeper of the barrow-kings and the forest law. They demand that armor be removed on their thresholds. They remember what the cantons forget.

Strings: The Unbuckled Threshold, the Barrow-King's Tribute (paid in stories), the Green Seal (which opens only to bare skin).

3.4 The Ducal Courts

Each canton has its court, its heralds, its keepers of chivalric record. They are the accountants of honor, tracking who owes whom the geste of protection.

Strings: The Sunburst Seal (fractured), the Tourney List, the Ransom Ledger.

Chapter 4

The Armor and the Song

4.1 The Ethorian Ballad of the Iron Bard

Before Corin, there was the legend. The Ethorians sing of a knight so armored he forgot his own face. He rode to a grove to meet his lady, but the trees would not part for steel. He unbuckled, and in that moment of vulnerability, he was struck. But he died smiling, having felt the sun.

This is the paradox of Vhasian chivalry: protection requires isolation, but honor requires connection. The armor is the barrier that makes mercy possible, but it must be lowered to deliver it.

4.2 Corin's Choice

During the siege of Rouen, Corin had three opportunities to re-buckle his gorget:

1. When he captured Alain (he left it open to hear the song).
2. When he spared the provincial soldier (he unbuckled to offer water).
3. When he carried the child (he removed his helm to see the boy's face).

CHAPTER 4. THE ARMOR AND THE SONG

Each unbuckling was a chivalric act. Each brought him closer to the spear.

Chapter 5

Patrons of the Armored

5.1 Mykkiel, the Judge of the Scar

Here, Mykkiel is the patron of chivalric law, of the code that binds knights. But his Vhasian face is stern: he demands that the code be followed exactly, even when it breaks the heart.

Rite of the Iron Seal (Low, 4 XP)

Seal a promise in armor. It cannot be broken without physical pain. (Mark +1 Obligation.)

Rite of the Unbuckled Gorget (Standard, 8 XP)

Open your armor to show vulnerability. Gain +2 dice to mercy rolls, but -2 to defense until the gorget is closed. (Mark +2 Obligation.)

5.2 Ikasha, She Who Sleeps in the Armor

The secret patron of knights who long to remove their steel. She offers the dream of connection, the memory of skin. She is dangerous because she makes the armor feel heavy.

Rite of the Forgotten Touch (Low, 4 XP)

Remember the sensation of rain on skin, of wind in hair. Gain +1 die to resist Corruption, but gain a Corruption tick anyway. (Mark +1 Fatigue.)

Rite of the Open Helm (Standard, 8 XP)

Remove your helm in a dangerous place. You are seen truly. The enemy knows your face. (Mark +2 Corruption; gain a String on anyone who witnesses.)

Chapter 6

The Knight's Legacy: New Talents

6.1 The Unbuckled Gorget (Minor, 4 XP)

Requirement: You have shown mercy while vulnerable.

You may declare, once per session, that you remove a piece of armor (helm, gauntlet, gorget) to show trust. Gain +1 die to social rolls with honorable enemies, but suffer +1 Harm from the next attack against you.

6.2 The Iron Bard's Burden (Major, 8 XP)

Requirement: You have forgotten your own face in the mirror of your armor.

Your Defense is increased by 1, but you cannot regain Stress through social interaction until you unbuckle for a full scene. The isolation is complete; the protection is total.

6.3 The Regret That Remains (Prestige, 12 XP)

Requirement: You have survived a moment of connection that destroyed you, as Corin survived until he didn't.

CHAPTER 6. THE KNIGHT'S LEGACY: NEW TALENTS

You are a living witness to the disconnect. When you die, you may choose: rise as a spirit of the threshold (guardian of a bridge or door, unable to leave but remembering all who pass) or pass into the song (become a ballad, sung by Cantors, your name a lesson in mercy).

Chapter 7

The Joust and the Raid

7.1 The Setup

The party are knights, squires, or witnesses in a Vhasia at peace—but a peace of tightened screws. The tourney season is beginning. The raids have not stopped, merely become ritualized. The Ethorian marches are restive.

7.2 The Endings

- The Armor Closes: The party chooses protection over mercy. The cantons close. The Wars begin.
- The Song Escapes: The party unbuckles, shows vulnerability, connects. They are destroyed by it, or saved, but the moment is real.
- The Cantor's Witness: Alain sings their story. They become legend, cautionary or celebrated, but they become memory.

CHAPTER 7. THE JOUST AND THE RAID

Chapter 8

Appendix: The Chivalric Ledger

8.1 The Five Gestes of Vhasian Chivalry

1. The Geste of the Shield (protection offered).
2. The Geste of the Sword (challenge given).
3. The Geste of the Helm (courtesy shown).
4. The Geste of the Unbuckled Gorget (mercy offered).
5. The Geste of the Song (witness borne).

8.2 Ethorian Folklore

The barrow-kings demand tribute in stories, not gold. The sacred groves require bare feet. The Barde de Fer is sung at unhelming ceremonies, when a knight removes armor for the last time (in death or in retirement).

This expansion was written in the Chapel of the Silent Stair, on paper made from tourney programs. The ink is lamp-black and the oil of unbuckled armor. The binding is felt, to muffle the bells.

The armor is polished. The song is sung. The gorget is open.

— The Clerk of Rouen, in the year of the joust