
adrule

THE GRAY WANDERER'S GRIMOIRE

A Complete Guide to Cantors, Invokers, Runekeepers, and Summoners

"You want power? Fine. But don't come crying when the debt comes due."

COMPILED FOR PDFL^AT_EX

With booktabs, microtype, and malice.

Contents

1	Introduction – A Voice from the Crossroads	1
2	The Weight of Names – How the Peoples of Fate’s Edge See Magic	3
2.1	Aeler – The Deep Accountants	3
2.2	Aelaerem – The Hearth-and-Hollow	4
2.3	Aelinnel – The Bright Weird	5
2.4	Linn – The Storm-Tested	5
2.5	Ykrul – The Weather Readers	6
2.6	Vhasia – The Fractured Lens	7
2.7	Viterra – The Hedge-Law Kingdom	7
2.8	Ecktoria – The Marble Ledger	8
2.9	Thepyrgos – The City of Stairs	9
2.10	Lethai – The Fair Folk’s Echo	10
2.11	The Gray Wanderer’s Conclusion	10
3	The Six Roads – Lore and Roleplay	11
3.1	The Runekeeper – Agent of the Inked Covenant	11
3.2	The Invoker – The Gambler at the Crossroads	12
3.3	The Cantor – The Touched Voice	13
3.4	The Witch – The Quiet Architect	13
3.5	The Psion – The Isolated Mind	14
3.6	The Summoner – The Door-Opener	15
4	Patrons of the Gray Wanderer	17
4.1	The Wild — Patrons of Nature and Season	17
4.1.1	Grimmir — The Wild Speaker	17
4.1.2	Raéyn — Mistress of the Sea	20
4.1.3	The Carrion-King — Master of Endings	22
4.2	The Shadow — Patrons of Secrets and Transformation	24
4.2.1	Ikasha — She Who Sleeps	24
4.2.2	Isoka — Angel of Serpents	26
4.2.3	Aveh — The Rider Behind the Storm	28
4.3	The Covenant — Patrons of Law and Truth	30
4.3.1	The Inquisitor Prime — Purity and Domination	30
4.3.2	The Witness — Keeper of Uncomfortable Truths	32
4.3.3	The Traveler — Lord of the Open Road	34

4.4	The Infinite — Patrons of the Unseen and Unknowable	36
4.4.1	Khemesh — The Abyssal Maw	36
4.4.2	The Ninth — Beyond Comprehension	38
4.5	The Necessary Evils — Patrons of Bond, Law, and Ruin	40
4.5.1	Mykkiel — Arbiter of the Covenant	40
4.5.2	Malachai — The Cruel Messenger	42
4.5.3	Inaea — Angel of the Spider	44
4.6	Summary of Patrons by Category	46
5	Free Casting — The Grammar of the Raw Weave	47
5.1	The Seventh Way	47
5.2	The Theyrgosi Lament — On Unsanctioned Magi	47
5.3	The TAGS Philosophy	48
5.4	Tag Lookup Reference	48
5.5	Backlash — The Weave's Revenge	49
5.6	The Three Faces of the Free Caster	50
5.7	Example Spells	50
5.8	Building Your Own Spells	51
6	Summoning — The Art of the Opened Door	53
6.1	What Passes Through the Door	53
6.2	The Two Philosophies	54
6.3	Cultural Traditions	54
6.4	The Leash and the Bargain	56
6.5	Sample Spirits	57
6.6	The Wanderer's Warning	58
7	The Cantor's Voice — Echoes and Entropy	59
7.1	The Song Without Swearing	59
7.2	The Price of the Song — Corruption as Metamorphosis	59
7.3	The Three Fates of the Cantor	60
7.4	The Patrons of Performance	61
7.4.1	Palinode — Queen of Encores	61
7.4.2	Thrysos — King of Revels	61
7.4.3	Other Voices	62
7.5	Singing the Rites — Mechanics of the Cantor	62
7.5.1	The Performance	63
7.5.2	The Corruption Clock	63
7.5.3	The Repertoire	63
7.5.4	The High Cantor	63
7.6	Embracing Corruption — The Art of Blooming	64
7.6.1	The Willing Metamorphosis	64
7.6.2	The Threshold of Ascension	64
7.6.3	The Wanderer's Final Warning on Blooming	64
7.6.4	The Talent: Embraced Corruption	65
8	The Invoker's Ledger — On Bargaining Without Bondage	67

8.1	The Natural Philosopher and the Alienist	67
8.2	The Symbol as Contract	68
8.2.1	The Slow Work and the Seal	68
8.3	Patrons of the Invoker	68
8.3.1	The Confessor Beneath the Bell (Burden & Exchange)	68
8.3.2	Morag the Hag – Weaver of Hidden Costs	70
8.4	Roleplay Hooks for the Invoker	71
9	The Quiet Work — On Witchcraft and the Threshold	73
9.0.1	Morag the Hag — The Price Unspoken	74
9.0.2	The High Mother — The Unbroken Chain	74
9.0.3	Inaea — Mercy and the Web	74
9.0.4	Isoka — The Serpent’s Shedding	74
9.0.5	Ikasha — She Who Sleeps in Silence	75
	A Secret Chapter Found in the Margins	77
10	The Silent Ledger – Psionics and the Mind’s Edge	81
10.1	The Wanderer’s Confession – A Conversation at the Dusty Page	81
10.2	What Psionics Is (and What It Is Not)	82
10.3	The Mind’s Ledger – Core Mechanics	82
10.3.1	Mental Fatigue	82
10.3.2	The Psionics Skill	83
10.4	The Nine Arts	83
10.4.1	Telekinesis – The Unseen Hand	83
10.4.2	Telepathy – The Silent Speech	84
10.4.3	Clairvoyance – The Distant Eye	84
10.4.4	Biofeedback – The Inward Physician	84
10.4.5	Astral Projection – The Walking Shade	84
10.4.6	Psychic Assault – The Breaking Thought	85
10.4.7	Mind Shield – The Walled Garden	85
10.4.8	Empathic Manipulation – The Emotional Architect	85
10.4.9	Precognition – Reading the Weather of the Skull	85
10.5	The Great Silence – A History Written in Scars	85
10.6	Cultural Faces of the Silent Art	86
10.6.1	Aeler – The Deep Accountants	86
10.6.2	Lethai – The Context Keepers	86
10.6.3	Ykrul – The Weather Readers	86
10.6.4	Vilakari – The Information Brokers	87
10.7	The Thought Trade – The Economics of the Mind	87
10.8	Psions as the Sixth Road	87
11	Last Words from the Gray Wanderer	89
	The Six Temperaments	93
	The Battlefield	95

Chapter 1

Introduction – A Voice from the Crossroads

“You want power? Fine. But don’t come crying when the debt comes due.”

— The Gray Wanderer

This grimoire is not a rulebook. It is a companion—a set of lenses through which to see the magical paths of Fate’s Edge. You will not find rigid orders or chartered guilds herein. There are no grandmasters to bow before, no academies whose diplomas protect you from the flame. What follows are approaches—six roads that diverge from the crossroads where power and price shake hands.

In Thepyrgos, a Synod clerk once called me a psy-ee-on—some term from the Vhasian badlands for those who hear thoughts without asking. I told him I do not read minds; I read the weight of what people owe. He wrote me down anyway, in his ledger of freaks and witch-marked. He was not entirely wrong, but he missed the point by a mile. The powers I have touched leave fingerprints that look like many things. I have worn the chains of a dozen Patrons and broken most of them. Twice. I have been called a Runekeeper in Aeler, a witch in Aelaerem, a Cantor in Silkstrand, a Summoner in Zakov, and a fool everywhere. The road changes the walker, and I have walked them all.

We will explore:

- The Six Roads—not merely the three paths of covenant, but the ways of the Runekeeper, the Invoker, the Cantor, the Witch, the Psion, and the Summoner. Who they are, how they think, and why they risk annihilation to keep walking.
- How to handle Obligation—not as a punishment, but as a story engine. You will find patron-specific ideas, intrusions, and acts of service, as well as the price of walking without a patron at all.
- Rituals without a focus—when your Codex is ash, your Symbol cracked, your voice alone, and your mind turned inward. Components matter again when the ledger is blank.
- The art of Summoning—binding spirits to will, from the deep stone to the salt foam, and the terrible etiquette required to send them back.

The voice you hear belongs to no one and everyone—a wanderer who has stood at the crossroads of every Patron’s attention, who has tasted the Hollow Tithe and climbed the Silent Stair, who has learned that the hedge is what keeps the wolves from the flock. Call me the Gray Wanderer. These notes are my legacy. Use them, lose them, or burn them for warmth. I won’t mind.

Now close the book. Go make some mistakes. I will be at the inn, buying the wine with a coin that shouldn’t exist, waiting to hear what road you choose.

— The Gray Wanderer

Chapter 2

The Weight of Names – How the Peoples of Fate’s Edge See Magic

“I have carried my power through a dozen cultures and been called a dozen things: saint, sinner, witch, warlock, fraud, fool. Every people has a word for what I do. None of them are quite right. None of them are quite wrong.”

— The Gray Wanderer

Magic in Fate’s Edge is not a single practice. It is a family of arguments with reality—and every culture argues differently. Some embrace the structured debt of Patrons. Others whisper to spirits at crossroads. A few have learned to bend the world with nothing but a disciplined mind. What follows is not a definitive guide—I have been corrected by village grandmothers and high priests alike—but a wanderer’s impressions, gathered over too many years on too many roads.

2.1 Aeler – The Deep Accountants

THE dwarves of Aeler do not speak of “magic.” They speak of “load,” “breath,” and “ledger.” A Rite is not a miracle—it is a contract with stone, sealed by proper measure and witnessed by a bell. A Runekeeper is an engineer of the invisible, and a witch is a mender of cracks in the world’s infrastructure.

What They Respect

- Runekeeper: The ideal Aeler mage. A Codex carved in slate, a Thiasos that chitters in the dark, and a precise understanding of Obligation. The mountain respects a debt you can count.
- Witch (Hearth craft): The women who keep the cisterns sweet and the gas vents predictable are not feared—they are salaried. Aeler employs witches as “Breath Wardens” and “Cistern Mothers.”

What They Mistrust

- Cantor: Too public. Too emotional. The deep stone does not like loud noises it cannot measure.
- Free Caster: An abomination. Power without a ledger is a cave-in waiting to happen.
- Psion: Rare, but when one appears, the Aeler assign them to the Deep Vaults—where their mind-reading is useful and their instability is contained.

The Breath-Bond

Every Aeler mage, regardless of path, must learn the Breath Bond: a meditation that converts psychic strain into measured breaths. A Psion in Aeler carries a bell on a leather cord. Each Mental Fatigue point is one bell-ring. When the bell rings three times too fast, a Corrector appears.

Famous Aeler Magic

The Spine Underway—a tunnel that remembers every traveler who has passed through it. Runekeepers maintain it by carving new Rites into the walls each century. Witches keep the air sweet. And the stone itself? It is said to be the oldest Summoner, awake and patient.

2.2 Aelaerem – The Hearth-and-Hollow

THE halfings of Aelaerem do not build temples to Patrons. They leave butter on cup-mark stones and hang red thread on hawthorn. Their magic is domestic—and therefore invisible to those who look only for grand gestures.

What They Respect

- Witch: The Aelaerem are the heartland of witchcraft. Every village has a Hedge-Mother who knows which knot to tie for a safe birth and which bell to ring to keep the Hollow from swallowing a child.
- Cantor: Folk songs are the oldest grimoire. A Cantor who sings the old tunes and respects the “no ninth” rule is welcome at any hearth.
- Summoner: But only brownies, field-wights, and the small dead. Aelaerem summoners do not call demons—they ask the ancestors to move the firewood.

What They Mistrust

- Invoker: Carrying Symbols from multiple Patrons is seen as greedy. The Hollow does not forgive divided loyalty.
- Psion: “Reading thoughts without asking” is a violation of hospitality. A known psion will find doors closing and cup-mark stones left dry.

The Hollow Tithe

Once a year, the Aelaerem pay the Hollow Tithe: a basket of the year’s best bread, left at the edge of a barrow. Witches conduct the rite. No one speaks during the walk back. I have done it three times. Something was always following. Something always stopped at the village gate.

2.3 Aelinnel – The Bright Weird

THE gnomes of Aelinnel live in a world where numbers have manners and doors sometimes lead to last Tuesday. Their magic is not chaotic—it is algebraic. They have names for equations that other cultures do not know exist.

What They Respect

- Free Caster: The gnomes invented the TAGS system, though they call it “Contextual Recursion.” A free caster who can improvise a spell on the spot is a philosopher, not a danger.
- Psion: The mind is the ultimate context. Aelinnel psions are trained from childhood to “count the thoughts” and “measure the echo.”
- Summoner: Spirits are just data from a previous iteration of reality. Treat them politely and document everything.

What They Mistrust

- Runkeeper: Too rigid. A Rite carved in stone cannot adapt to a changing context. The gnomes prefer the flexibility of witch-knots and psionic whispers.
- Cantor: A song that cannot be written in two ledgers (Said and Meant) is dangerous. The gnomes have banned three hymns in the last decade.

The Green Gate

The most famous Aelinnel threshold—a sea-arch that opens at certain tides to a forest not on any map. Witches and Free Casters use it to travel between realities. Psions use it to test their mental resilience. The gnomes charge a toll: one truth you have never told anyone, and one lie you have never been caught telling.

2.4 Linn – The Storm-Tested

THE northmen of Linn do not ask permission from Patrons. They make oaths—and the sea witnesses. Their magic is carved into keels, braided into ropes, and whispered into the ears of drowning men.

What They Respect

- Summoner (Selkie and Drowned): A Linn tide-witch who can call a selkie for navigation or a drowned captain for warning is worth her weight in whalebone.
- Cantor: Sea shanties are weather magic. A Cantor who sings the right note at the right moment can calm a storm—or call one.
- Witch (Wake-Judge): The Linn have formalized witchcraft into a legal system. Wake-Judges arbitrate disputes at the water’s edge, using promise clocks to bind oaths.

What They Mistrust

- Invoker: Borrowing power from a Patron is seen as weakness. A real northman makes his own luck.
- Psion: Too quiet. The Linn prefer their magic loud enough to hear over the wind.

The Thing-Bell

Every Linn longship has a bell forged from the melted-down sword of the ship’s first captain. When a Runekeeper or Witch needs to seal an oath, they ring the Thing-Bell. The sound carries across water. The dead listen.

2.5 Ykrul – The Weather Readers

THE orcs of the Violet Steppe do not separate magic from survival. A bone-singer who calls a storm is no different from a scout who reads the grass. Both are necessary. Both can get you killed.

What They Respect

- Summoner (Ancestral): The drum is the oldest Codex. A Ykrul summoner who can call a wolf-ancestor or a wind-horse is honored at any campfire.
- Psion (Precognition): The Ykrul call psions “Weather Readers”—not because they predict rain, but because they see the shape of the future in the same way a rider sees the shape of the steppe.
- Witch (Road craft): A witch who can bind a promise with a knotted cord or curse a rival with a handful of grave-dust is a valued member of any clan.

What They Mistrust

- Runekeeper: Too slow. The steppe does not wait for you to carve a Rite.
- Invoker: Carrying Symbols from multiple Patrons is seen as divided loyalty. A Ykrul warrior serves one banner.
- Cantor: But only because a song that binds a crowd is a leash. The Ykrul value freedom too highly.

The Red Weather

When a Ykrul witch curses a horse-thief, they do not use subtlety. They tie a red cord around a splinter of the thief’s saddle and burn it in a storm. The “Red Weather”—a sudden, localized squall—is said to follow the cursed until they return what they stole. I have seen it happen twice. I have no explanation.

2.6 Vhasia – The Fractured Lens

THE Vhasians inherited the ruins of the Utaran Empire and learned to argue over the pieces. Their magic is legalistic, factional, and surprisingly bureaucratic.

What They Respect

- Runekeeper: A Vhasian Runekeeper is a notary with teeth. Their Codex contains Rites, yes, but also contracts, property deeds, and the terms of three unresolved feuds.
- Invoker: Multiple Patrons? In Vhasia, that is called “diversification.” A noble who keeps Symbols from Aveh (for escape), Mykkiel (for contracts), and the Witness (for truth) is merely prudent.
- Witch (Cunning craft): Every Vhasian village has a hedge-witch who speaks for the old saints. The Church of the Everflame pretends not to notice.

What They Mistrust

- Free Caster: Too unpredictable. The Vhasian legal system cannot bill a free caster for damages if there is no contract.
- Psion: Reading minds without permission is a crime—and the Vhasian Parlement has written three laws against it. Enforcement is spotty.

The Parlement of Dust

In the catacombs beneath the Sun Palace, a secret court of Runekeepers adjudicates disputes between magical factions. They meet by candlelight and seal their judgments with wax mixed with grave-dust. No one admits the court exists. Everyone with real power obeys its rulings.

2.7 Viterra – The Hedge-Law Kingdom

THE Viterrans are practical people. Their magic grows in hedgerows and hides in parish ledgers. A witch in Viterra is not a mystic—she is a “map adjuster” who knows where the boundary stones should really be.

What They Respect

- Witch (Threshold): The Viterran “hedge-wright” is a legal as well as magical profession. They draw property lines, witness oaths, and ensure that the new mill does not cross the ancient right-of-way.
- Runekeeper: But only those who specialize in “precedent Rites”—spells that make a past judgment binding on the present.
- Cantor: A village Cantor who sings the old ballads at the harvest festival is beloved. One who sings politics is exiled.

What They Mistrust

- Summoner: Spirits cannot own property. The Viterran courts have ruled that a ghost’s testimony is inadmissible.
- Psion: The Queen’s Justiciars have a standing bounty on unlicensed telepaths. Privacy is the foundation of property law.

The Tilt-Yard Audits

Before a Viterran Runekeeper can invoke a Rite that affects land ownership, they must “audit” the spell before a panel of Dawn-Knights. The knights strike the Codex with a sword. If the Rite survives three blows, it is lawful. I have seen a Codex shatter on the second strike. The Runekeeper was fined for “magical noise pollution.”

2.8 Ecktoria – The Marble Ledger

ECKTORIA sits on the bones of the old Utaran Empire and pretends they are a throne. Their magic is ceremonial, political, and obsessed with appearances.

What They Respect

- Runekeeper (Everflame): The state religion has its own Runekeepers—the “Censer-Knights”—who march in processions and purify heretics with blessed fire.
- Invoker: Ecktorian nobles collect Symbols the way they collect statues of forgotten emperors. Display is more important than use.
- Cantor: A Cantor who can make a crowd weep with a hymn is a political asset. The Grand Magistrate employs three.

What They Mistrust

- Witch: Hedge-craft is “peasant magic.” The Everflame preaches against it, but every noble’s wife knows a witch who can brew a love potion.
- Psion: The Chain-Lanterns hunt psions with particular zeal. A mind that cannot be seen is a mind that might be planning rebellion.
- Summoner: The Ecktorian view on spirits is simple: if it is dead, it should stay dead. The Inquisition has burned three summoners in my lifetime.

The Censor’s Mask

At the annual Triumph, the Censor of Ecktoria wears a mask that is said to be a psionic artifact from the Great Silence. It lets him see the true intentions of every petitioner. I knelt before him once. He saw that I wanted his wine. He laughed and gave me a cup. The mask is real.

2.9 Thepyrgos – The City of Stairs

THEPYRGOS is a nation of clerks and philosophers who believe that a properly argued case can bend reality. Their magic is academic, verbal, and exhausting.

What They Respect

- Free Caster: The University of Thepyrgos teaches the TAGS system as “practical metaphysics.” A free caster with a degree can charge triple.
- Psion: The Synod has a standing committee on “mental hygiene.” Licensed psions work as legal investigators. Unlicensed ones are hunted.
- Witch (Bell craft): The Thepyrgos bell-towers are thresholds. Bell-wardens are respected civic employees.

What They Mistrust

- Runekeeper: Too reliant on a single Patron. The Thepyrgos prefer negotiators, not worshippers.
- Cantor: A crowd that sings together is a crowd that might riot. The Archon limits public performances by Cantors to three per week.

The Silent Stair

Behind the Synod Hall, a staircase that leads nowhere—but psions claim it leads to the space between thoughts. The University paid me a handsome sum to climb it and report back. I climbed for an hour. The stairs did not end. I turned around and walked down. I was back in the same courtyard. I do not climb it anymore.

2.10 Lethai – The Fair Folk’s Echo

THE elves of the Valewood do not practice magic. They—and this is important—are magic, or at least they have forgotten where they end and the Weave begins. A Lethai Runekeeper is a contradiction. A Lethai Cantor is a redundancy. A Lethai Witch is a priestess of a religion that has no name.

What They Respect

- Witch (Silk and Shed): The Lethai have two witch traditions: the Silk Vigil (Inaea, mercy, continuity) and the Shed Vigil (Isoka, transformation, hard choices). Both are woven into the fabric of Lethai law.
- Summoner: Spirits are just neighbors who live in a different room. The Lethai treat them with courtesy—and a healthy dose of suspicion.
- Cantor: A Lethai shira (song-weaver) can wrap a promise in a melody so beautiful that you forget you are bound. Their betrayal is legendary.

What They Mistrust

- Invoker: Why borrow power from a Patron when you could simply be the power? The Lethai see Invokers as beggars in silk robes.
- Psion: Reading a Lethai mind without context is impossible—their thoughts are saturated with memory, season, and relationship. Psions who try often leave mad.
- Free Caster: Too crude. The Lethai prefer their magic to have rules, even if the rules are secret.

The Ninth Walk

Once a generation, a Lethai witch walks the “Ninth Walk”—a pilgrimage through thresholds that do not exist on any map. She returns with a new law for the Lethai courts. The last Ninth Walk produced the rule: “No bell may ring nine times.” No one remembers why. Everyone obeys.

2.11 The Gray Wanderer’s Conclusion

I have been called a Runekeeper in Aeler, a witch in Aelaerem, a Cantor in Silkstrand, a Summoner in Zakov, a Psion in Thepyrgos, and a fool everywhere. The truth is simpler: every culture sees magic as it sees itself. The Aeler see a ledger. The Linn see an oath. The Thepyrgos see a debate. The Lethai see a dream.

You will find your own path. You will be misunderstood. You will be feared, honored, hunted, or hired—sometimes all in the same day. When that happens, remember this: the power is not in the Rite or the Song or the silent thought. The power is in the choice to use them.

Now close the book. Go make some mistakes. I will be at the inn.

Chapter 3

The Six Roads – Lore and Roleplay

“I have worn the face of a knight, a warlock, a hedge-priest, and a hunted freak. The path chooses you as much as you choose it, and the debt is always the same weight, though the coin differs.”

— The Gray Wanderer

There are not three paths through the thornwood, but six. Six roads that diverge from the crossroads where power and price shake hands. Do not mistake these for guilds or orders—there are no charters signed in ink, no grandmasters to bow before. These are approaches, lenses through which the world’s hidden gears become visible. A Runekeeper sworn to the Inquisitor Prime shares more with that burning zealot than with a Runekeeper of Grimmer, though both carry Codices. An Invoker of Aveh has more in common with a gambler drowning in debt than with a Witch who tends the same crossroads. The road shapes the walker.

3.1 The Runekeeper – Agent of the Inked Covenant

“I do not beg. I record. And in the recording, I become the hand that writes the law.”

The Runekeepers are the agents of the great powers—not merely users of magic, but its dedicated representatives, its priests and its executioners. To become a Runekeeper is to cease being merely yourself and become an extension of your Patron’s will in the world. You are the ledger made flesh, the vow walking on two legs.

But do not think this creates uniformity. A Runekeeper is as varied as the Patron they serve:

- The Mykkielan Templar serves the Stone-Judge with gavel and flame. She is paladin and notary both, her Codex bound in chain-mail, her Thiasos a hound of ash and seal-wax. She does not heal; she adjudicates wounds, declaring them lawful or heretical.
- The Grimmeric Druid is engineer of root and rot, his Codex carved into living bark, his Thiasos a fungal thing that speaks in spores. He maintains the treaty between the planted field and the wild wood, ensuring neither forgets its bounds.

- The Artificer of Aelinnel treats her Patron's Rites as formulae, her Codex a notebook of impossible geometries. She builds devices—clocks that measure time backwards, lenses that see obligations as glowing threads—arguing that she does not perform miracles, but merely applies context.
- The Inquisitor of the Everflame carries a Codex of censure, each page a warrant for burning. Her Thiasos is a censer that never goes cold, and she is less mage than mobile courthouse, sentencing corruption to annihilation.

What unites them is structure. The Codex is not merely a tool but a contract made visible, a ledger of debts paid and owed. The Thiasos is not a pet but a fragment of the Patron's attention, a bailiff sent to ensure the terms are kept. Lose the Codex, and you are a knight without armor. Lose the Thiasos, and you are a debtor whose creditor has just remembered where you live.

Roleplay Hooks

- Your Codex is incomplete—the last page was torn out by your predecessor. What was on it? Why did they fear it enough to destroy it?
- Your Thiasos grows more demanding. Last week it required a drop of blood. This week, it whispers for a finger.
- You have begun to dream in your Patron's voice. When you wake, you are never certain which of you made the decisions yesterday.

3.2 The Invoker – The Gambler at the Crossroads

“I do not serve. I rent. And when the landlord comes to collect, I had best have the coin ready, or the interest will be paid in teeth.”

If the Runekeeper is the sworn knight, the Invoker is the desperate cardsharp who has learned the house rules well enough to cheat—briefly, dangerously, at terrible interest. The Invoker carries Symbols, physical anchors to Patrons they have never fully sworn to. They are the gamblers of the magical world, but they do not bet on luck. They bet on knowledge—the precise understanding of what each Patron requires, what each Symbol will bear, and exactly how far they can push before the debt comes due.

Their rites are slow, respectful, almost contractual in their precision. An Invoker does not rush the bargain. She polishes her Symbols. She leaves offerings at crossroads. She learns the true names of her Patrons' servants so she may address them properly when the time comes. This is the quiet work, the maintenance of the debt.

But when the knife is at the throat, when the building is burning, when the demon is already through the door—then she performs the Crack the Seal. She invokes the Rite not as a supplicant but as a creditor calling in an emergency loan. The price is never small. The Symbol may crack. The Patron may arrive personally to discuss terms. But for that moment, she holds power she has not earned, and the world bends.

Roleplay Hooks

- You carry four Symbols—the limit before friction. Every morning, roll them like bones. Which two whisper to each other today? Which one has begun to weep?
- You found a Symbol in a dead man's hand. You do not know which Patron it belongs to. You use it anyway. Sometimes, it works in your favor. Sometimes, it demands tasks you do not understand.
- You have never met your Patron. You are not certain they know you exist. But the debt grows anyway, and lately, you have seen their servants watching from across crowded rooms.

3.3 The Cantor – The Touched Voice

“You think you need a lute? My larynx is older than any tree. Hum, and the world will listen. Scream, and it might answer back.”

Cantors are the wild singers, the mad pipers, the hymn-leaders who do not worship at the altar but become the altar. Their power is intimacy—unmediated, visceral, and deeply dangerous. They do not swear to Patrons as Runekeepers do. They do not bargain as Invokers do. They echo the Patron's will through their own flesh, becoming resonant chambers for forces that were never meant to fit inside a mortal throat.

Because they do not swear, they cannot break an oath. But they can be touched. Corruption for a Cantor is not a debt to be paid but a transformation undergone. The voice develops harmonics that should not exist. The breath carries scents from places that are not on any map. The eyes change color when they sing. Some Cantors grow feathers in their hair. Others find their shadows lagging half a step behind. They are corrupted not by obligation but by proximity—standing too close to the fire for too long, singing the songs that ears were not meant to hear.

They require no focus but their own bodies. A Cantor without a voice can tap rhythm on their ribs. One without hands can whistle through their teeth. The body remembers the song even when the mind has forgotten it.

Roleplay Hooks

- You sang a forbidden note once, and now a fragment of a dead Cantor lives in your head, humming tunes that predict the weather three days hence.
- Your voice is unmistakable—enemies recognize you by your timbre, and allies find themselves weeping when you speak certain words, though they know not why.
- You are trying to write a new Song, but every attempt leaves you feverish for a week. The Song is writing you, and it has plans for your vocal cords that you do not yet understand.

3.4 The Witch – The Quiet Architect

“They call it hedge-magic. They call it petty. They do not see that the hedge is what keeps the wolves from the flock, the blight from the crop, the forgotten god from waking hungry.”

Witches practice the systemic magic that maintains the world—the quiet, overlooked power that is at once invisible and essential. While Runekeepers swear and Cantors sing, Witches tend. They are the ones who know that a threshold must be swept three times counter-clockwise to keep the Hollow from noticing it. They understand that milk sours not because of bacteria but because a promise was broken three houses down. They are the plumbers of the metaphysical, the ones who ensure that the pipes of reality do not burst.

This makes them feared more than loved. A Runekeeper's power is legible—there is a Codex, a Patron, a clear chain of command. A Witch's power is organic, grown from relationships with places and spirits that have no names in any grimoire. They work with the Ninth, with thresholds, with the accumulated weight of stories. They are overlooked until the moment they are needed, and then they are feared, because they hold the keys to doors that others did not know existed.

Every culture has Witches, though they call them different things—Hedge-Mothers, Breath-Wardens, Map-Adjusters, Cistern-Keepers. They are the ones who remember that magic is not merely for throwing fireballs but for ensuring that the fire does not burn down the village.

Roleplay Hooks

- You owe debts to three different spirits: the river that borders your village, the oak at the crossroads, and the crow that follows you. None have called them in yet, but they will.
- You cannot cross running water without making an offering. You do not remember why, but the one time you tried, you nearly drowned in three inches of rain.
- A village that once shunned you now begs for your help. The blight is back. You could save them, but the price they paid last time—your grandmother's name, erased from memory—still stings.

3.5 The Psion – The Isolated Mind

“I carry no Symbol. I keep no Codex. My power has no scent, no sound, no outward sign. And that is why they fear me most of all.”

Psions are the isolated ones, the untrusted, the inward-turned. Where other paths borrow from outside powers, the Psion looks only to the self—the disciplined, trained, dangerous self. They carry no outward signs of their power. There is no glowing staff, no familiar, no song to warn you. They are accountable only to themselves, and in a world built on debts and obligations, this makes them suspect.

In Aeler, they are sealed in the Deep Vaults, useful but contained. In Thepyrgos, they are licensed and monitored by committees of “mental hygiene.” In Aelaerem, they are shunned for violating hospitality—reading thoughts without asking is the gravest sin in a culture that values the unspoken boundary. Even among the free-minded Aelinnel, they are treated with caution, for a mind that needs no Patron is a mind that answers to no law.

Their power is attrition. They pay not in Obligation but in themselves—every thought bent, every future glimpsed, every object moved by will alone leaves a hairline crack in the vessel. They are slow to burn and slow to recover, patient as glaciers, and just as capable of crushing what stands in their path.

Roleplay Hooks

- You have seen your own death in a precognitive vision. It was banal—a fall from a horse, three decades hence. But you cannot stop checking your saddle straps.
- You once read the mind of a lover. You found exactly what you feared. You have never trusted anyone since.
- The Synod has a file on you. You have seen it, though you were not meant to. They do not yet know you are a psion. The game of cat and mouse sustains you.

3.6 The Summoner – The Door-Opener

“I do not command the dead. I do not command the fey, the demons, the angels, or the things that wear the shapes of forgotten gods. I ask. I pay the price. And sometimes, when the contract is fair, they answer.”

Summoners are the diplomats of the damned and the blessed alike, the ones who open doors and hope to close them before something follows through. But understand: all things beyond the veil are spirits. The dead who cling to memory are spirits. The fey who trade in stolen time are spirits. The animistic forces that sleep in stones and storms are spirits. The angels that guard the thresholds of judgment, and the demons that wait hungry at the edge of sin—they are all spirits, and they all speak the language of contract.

A Summoner of Aeler awakens the indigenous memories of stone—spirits that were never born and will never die, only sleep and dream in granite. A Summoner of Ykrul drums the ancestors from the earth—spirits of blood and bone who remember the steppe when it was ocean. A Summoner of Zakov swallows cursed coins and calls the drowned—vengeful spirits of water and salt. The church-burned heretic who calls an angel is still a Summoner. The desert madman who whispers to the storm is still a Summoner.

The difference is the Leash—the spiritual strain of keeping an Outsider in the world. The dead want to return to death. The fey want to return to the wild. The demons want to stay, and to make room for themselves by pushing you out. The Leash ticks. When it fills, the spirit acts once according to its nature—often destructively—then departs, or turns hostile, or simply takes what it was promised and leaves you holding the empty air.

Roleplay Hooks

- You once called a spirit that still follows you—not hostile, just curious, watching from reflections and shadows, waiting for you to be interesting again.
- Your mentor disappeared during a summoning. You found their Symbol but not their body. You suspect they are still somewhere in the Ways Between, and someday, they will find their way back.
- A spirit you bound years ago now demands renegotiation. It claims the contract has a loophole—a comma out of place, a clause you mispronounced. It is right. It is always right.

These are the Six Roads. They cross, they diverge, and sometimes they run parallel until the walker looks down and realizes they have been walking the same path all along. Choose yours. But choose knowing that the road changes the walker, and the debt is never fully paid.

Chapter 4

Patrons of the Gray Wanderer

“You wish to walk the road of power? Then listen well. The world is old, and older still are the voices beneath it. We call them Patrons, though they were never sworn to us. They are the great constants, the landlords of reality, and we are merely tenants who have learned to pick the locks.”

— The Gray Wanderer

Patrons are vast intelligences—not gods in the way the Everflame preaches, though some worship them as such. They are embodiments of concepts and forces older than the first stone. Each offers power, but always with cost: fatigue, scars upon fate, or a slow unweaving of one’s own story.

Understand that a Patron does not care how you approach them. The Six Roads all lead to the same altars. A Runekeeper of Grimmir is his agent, his voice in the wild places, his priest of root and rot. An Invoker of Grimmir rents his power for a season, a gambler betting on green growth. A Witch of Grimmir tends the threshold between field and forest, owing nothing to the Wild Speaker but the breath she takes while crossing. All three draw from the same source. All three pay different prices.

This chapter presents fourteen Patrons chosen for their utility and distinct themes, organized into five categories. Each entry includes the Patron’s lore, cultural variants across the peoples of Fate’s Edge, and the obligations they demand—whether you are Agent, Gambler, Touched Voice, Threshold Keeper, Isolated Mind, or Door-Opener.

4.1 The Wild — Patrons of Nature and Season

4.1.1 Grimmir — The Wild Speaker

“In the space between planted row and forest edge, where the first grain met the first acorn, Grimmir waits. He speaks in the rustle of leaves, the migration of birds, and the patient growth of ancient oaks.”

Grimmir walks the threshold between cultivated lands and untamed wilderness. Neither wholly beast nor entirely human, he speaks in root and stone, seasons and sap.

What They Represent: Primal wisdom, seasonal cycles, the treaty between civilisation and wilderness.

Cultural Variants:

- Aeler (Dwarves): Called the Root-Father, patron of deep fungus and stone-lichen. His shrines are carved into living rock where moss is never cleared.
- Ykrul (Orcs): A sky-wolf who herds the seasons; shamans invoke Grimmer to predict the spring thaw. His symbol is a wolf's paw print in ash.
- Aelaerem (Halflings): the Thorn-Father, keeper of hedgerow magic. Villagers tie red thread around his roadside stones before planting.
- Vilikari (Federates): A two-faced figure—one side a sower, one side a reaper—invoked at both planting and harvest festivals.

Playing a Follower of Grimmer:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the Root-Father's hand in the world, his engineer of the invisible. Your Codex is carved in slate or bark, your Thiasos a fungal thing or a beast of green shadow. You do not merely cast Rites—you maintain the treaty between field and forest, ensuring neither forgets its bounds. Your obligations are seasonal: plantings, cullings, the maintenance of boundaries.

The Gambler (Invoker): You carry a sprig of rowan wood or a wolf's tooth, renting power for the moment of need. You are useful to farmers and terrifying to city folk. When you Crack the Seal, the wild comes fast and hungry—roots through cobblestones, wolves in the marketplace. The price is always paid in cultivation: you must tend something wild, or wild something tended.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You need no Codex. You are the hedge-mother, the Breath-Warden. Your magic is in the cup-mark stones, the red thread, the three knots tied counter-clockwise. Grimmer pays you in favors, not debts, but he always collects at harvest.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Plant a tree or restore a damaged grove.
- Kill a predator that has grown unnaturally bold.
- Teach a villager to read a seasonal sign.

Patron's Gift (Imbuement): Your Thiasos or your own hands glow with verdant energy. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Survival and Nature rolls, and your melee strikes deal +1 Harm against creatures of corruption or blight. This replaces the standard +1 Melee / +1 Thematic—you choose which benefit applies when you use the Gift.

Alternative Gift — Wildshape (Minor Transformation): You may spend an action and mark 1 Obligation to assume the form of a small beast (wolf, hawk, badger, or similar) for up to one scene. While transformed, you gain +2 dice to Stealth and Perception in natural terrain, but cannot speak or use tools. You may revert as a free action. This counts as your Patron's Gift for the scene—you cannot also gain the Imbuement bonuses.

Rites — Strategic Use:Low Rites

- The Speaking Seed (4 XP): Commune with local plant life.

- The Season's Turn (5 XP): Align with seasonal power.

Standard Rites

- Verdant Tongue (8 XP): Speak with all plant and animal life in Near range.
- The Thornveil (7 XP): Raise a living barrier.

Advanced Rites

◆ The World's Wound ◆

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Heal a blighted place or quicken a damaged ecosystem. Clear taint, restore fertility, awaken dormant forces. Begin an Ecosystem Restoration [8] clock.

GM Guidance — Grimmer's Intrusions:

1. A tree you passed yesterday is now blocking your path—with a face carved into it that looks like yours.
2. All food you touch spoils within an hour unless you offer the first bite to the earth.
3. A pack of wolves shadows the party for a full day. They do not attack—they simply watch.

4.1.2 Raéyn — Mistress of the Sea

“Mark the tide, name your course, and trust the wave-road. But speak ill of Khemesh, and even I may let the deep take you.”

Raéyn is the tempestuous goddess of the sea, the restless tide that carries news between shores. Mother to all who sail, her voice the wind that fills sails and her moods the storms that test every mariner’s resolve.

What They Represent: Tides, change, sea travel, storms, the dual nature of the ocean.

Cultural Variants:

- Kahfagia: the Lantern-Tide. Pilots light a beacon to Raéyn before every night voyage. Her symbol is a wave curling into a spiral.
- Linn: the Whale-Mother. Raéyn is the great she-whale who carries the drowned to the afterlife in her belly. Funerals at sea involve a song and a single white stone.
- Zakov: the Salt-Queen. Pirates carve her face on their figureheads—one eye open (fair seas), one eye closed (storms ahead).

Playing a Follower of Raéyn:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the navigator-priest, the keeper of the wave-roads. Your Codex is a logbook of tides and ley-lines, your Thiasos a gull or a small fish that never dies. You consecrate ships and bless crossings, maintaining the covenant between vessel and water.

The Touched Voice (Cantor): You sing the shanties that calm storms or call them. Your voice carries salt. Corruption for you takes the form of brine—your tears taste of the ocean, your blood leaves salt crystals on your skin, and you sometimes hear the drowned singing in your sleep.

The Door-Opener (Summoner): You call the selkies, the drowned captains, the wave-walkers. You bind them with ropes of kelp and promises of shore-leave. Your Leash is a tide-clock; when it fills, the spirit returns to the depths, often taking a memento with it.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Pour a libation into the sea before a voyage, asking for nothing in return.
- Rescue a drowning creature—a sailor, a fisher, even a seabird.
- Walk the shore at dawn or dusk and listen. If you hear the waves speaking a name, speak it back.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your touch carries the scent of brine and rolling waves. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Athletics (swimming) and Navigation, and you ignore one level of environmental penalty from storms or choppy water.

Alternative Gift — Tide-Step: Once per session as a free action, you may treat any water-based difficult terrain as stable ground for one exchange. Alternatively, you may move across the surface of water as if it were solid for up to Near distance. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Tidemark’s Blessing (4 XP): Treat slick or water-slicked footing as stable.

- Whispering Currents (5 XP): Learn the safest near-term route across water.

Standard Rites

- The Changing Tide (8 XP): Bias currents and water levels in a zone.
- Wave-Road Blessing (7 XP): Consecrate a wave-road for +2 dice to travel.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Storm-Queen's Hand ◆

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Shape a storm-band over a zone (sea or shore). Choose two modes: propulsion, concealment, or smite.

GM Guidance — Raéyn's Intrusions:

1. A sudden fog rolls in—all navigation rolls at –2 dice for the scene.
2. The tide turns early, stranding a vessel you need.
3. A dolphin, seal, or sea eagle follows the party for a day. It will deliver one short message to the nearest follower of Raéyn if fed something shiny.

4.1.3 The Carrion-King — Master of Endings

“What crumbles feeds what grows. What dies becomes the soil of tomorrow’s triumph. Do not mourn the fallen—harvest them.”

The Carrion-King is not a lord of rot for its own sake. He is the alchemist of endings, the patient gardener who sees every corpse as compost.

What They Represent: Decay, renewal, transformation.

Cultural Variants:

- Vhasia: the Dust-Accountant. Soldiers leave a button from a fallen comrade on a cairn—the King will turn that button into a bullet for the next battle.
- Aeler: the Under-Gardener. Dwarven crypts have bioluminescent fungus fed by the dead. Tending it is an act of devotion.
- Inquisitor Prime’s View: Witch-hunters see the Carrion-King as a necromantic menace, confusing ‘natural decay’ with ‘unholy resurrection’.

Playing a Follower of the Carrion-King:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the Dust-Accountant, the Under-Gardener. You tend the crypts, ensure the proper cycle of rot and renewal. Your Codex is bound in grave-leather, your Thiasos a beetle or a worm. You do not raise the dead—you compost them, returning them to the cycle with proper accounting.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You are the one who knows that death is a threshold like any other. You work with the Hollow, with the compost heap, with the cisterns that must be kept sweet. You understand that the Carrion-King is not death but the transformation that follows death.

The Gambler (Invoker): You carry teeth and bones, cracking the seal to accelerate decay or renewal. You are useful in sieges and plagues, feared by the living, respected by the desperate. When you overreach, the rot comes too fast—your own flesh softening, your nails yellowing.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Compost a fallen enemy’s body and use the soil to plant something edible.
- Salvage a ruined structure and give the reclaimed materials to a needy family.
- Teach someone that loss is not failure.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your touch carries the scent of turned earth and gentle decay. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Medicine and Craft rolls involving organic materials, and you may convert one minor item of personal value into a single dose of natural remedy or poison.

Alternative Gift — Harvest Resonance: Once per scene after an enemy is defeated or a significant ending occurs, you may draw a sliver of that ending’s energy. Gain +1 die on your next action, or clear 1 Fatigue. This counts as your Patron’s Gift for the scene.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Rite of Consuming Rot (5 XP): Accelerate natural decay to weaken organic materials.

- Rite of the Harvested End (4 XP): Extract value from a recent ending.

Standard Rites

- Rite of the Fertile Death (8 XP): Transform death into growth—create advantageous terrain or grant healing bonuses.
- Rite of the Transformed Spirit (7 XP): Channel the essence of a recently deceased being.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Eternal Cycle ◆

Cost: 14 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: Complete a transformation cycle. Destroy one major asset, enemy, or obstacle, and create something new of equal or greater value.

GM Guidance — Carrion-King's Intrusions:

1. A dead creature you passed earlier is now following you—not as an enemy, but as a witness.
2. All food in the party's packs spoils instantly, except for a single loaf of black bread.
3. A villager you saved now bears a small rot-mark that spreads one inch each day.

4.2 The Shadow — Patrons of Secrets and Transformation

4.2.1 Ikasha — She Who Sleeps

“Blow out the candle. If the room listens back, ask softly. At the next crossroads, the raven waits—and the shadow remembers your passing.”

Ikasha is the hush between footfalls, the patience of dark water, the black-feathered watcher at every threshold. In stillness she gathers what might be.

What They Represent: Latent potential, shadow, thresholds, forgotten things.

Cultural Variants:

- Mistlands: the Bell-Shrouded; bell-wardens leave a single rope unknotted for her, so she may ring silence when needed.
- Zakov: the Tide Watcher, a smuggler’s patron. She rises with the night tide, and her ravens carry messages between pirate captains.
- Aeler: the Deep Listener; miners whisper to her before descending into new shafts.

Playing a Follower of Ikasha:

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You are the bell-warden, the one who leaves the rope unknotted. You know that every doorway is a promise, every threshold a negotiation. You do not invoke Ikasha—you invite her to witness. Your magic is in the silence between bells, the space between breaths.

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the Deep Listener, the secret notary of shadows. Your Codex is written in invisible ink, your Thiasos a raven that speaks only in riddles. You record what others forget, maintaining the ledger of the unspoken.

The Isolated Mind (Psion): You are the smuggler of thoughts, the one who moves through minds like Ikasha moves through doorways. You require no rites, only the silence of your own skull. You pay in the loneliness of knowing what others forget.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Spend a night in absolute darkness, speaking no word and lighting no flame.
- Carry a secret for someone—a truth that would ruin them—and tell no one for a full season.
- At a crossroads, leave a black feather and a single coin. Do not look back.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your form seems to drink the light. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Stealth and Deception, and your footsteps make no sound unless you choose otherwise.

Alternative Gift — Shadow Meld: Once per session as an action, you may step into any shadow larger than yourself and emerge from another shadow within Near range. You cannot be targeted while moving between shadows. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Touch the Umbral Veil (4 XP): Start Controlled on one Stealth roll.
- Rite of the Crossroads Raven (5 XP): Summon an omen-raven for +1 die to navigation or pursuit.

Standard Rites

- Draw from the Umbral Reservoir (8 XP): Grant +2 dice to stealth, deception, or resolve.
- Secret Keeper's Burden (9 XP): Compel a truthful answer to one direct question.

Advanced Rites

◆ Become the Shadow at the Crossroads ◆

Cost: 12 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Intangible to mundane harm, pass through thresholds, +2 dice to Stealth, auto-succeed one escape.

GM Guidance — Ikasha's Intrusions:

1. A raven lands on your shoulder and whispers a secret you never wanted to know.
2. Your shadow stretches into the shape of a woman with a crown of black feathers.
3. A door you passed through earlier is now locked from the other side—and the key is in your pocket.

4.2.2 Isoka — Angel of Serpents

“Do not mourn the skin you shed. It was never meant to last. The venom that burns away the old self is the same that grants the strength to become new.”

Isoka teaches that every self is temporary—identity is a skin to be shed so growth can continue. Her serpents are omens and teachers.

What They Represent: Transformation, renewal, venom, the casting off of old selves.

Cultural Variants:

- Zakov: the Tide-Shedder. Pirates leave a lock of hair and a written name at her sunken temple; eels eat both.
- Acasia: the Copperhead. Hedge-cultists shed identities to infiltrate noble houses.
- Inquisitor Prime’s View: Isoka’s followers are shape-shifters and liars, abominations who erase themselves to avoid judgment.

Playing a Follower of Isoka:

The Touched Voice (Cantor): You are the Shedded, the one who sings the skin away. Your songs are not hymns but moltings. Corruption manifests as scales, as the inability to hold a single form, as voices that speak from your throat that are not your own.

The Agent (Runekeeper): You serve as the Copperhead, the infiltrator-priest. Your Codex contains no true names—only aliases. Your Thiasos sheds its skin regularly, each shedding revealing a new face. You maintain the temple’s secrets by becoming them.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You know the Shed Vigil, the vigil of hard choices. You work with knots that untie themselves, with cords that bind by loosening. You understand that transformation requires sacrifice, and you are willing to help others pay it.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Shed a physical token of your old life—a piece of clothing, a weapon, a letter—and leave it at a crossroads.
- Forgive someone who wronged you, publicly and completely, as an act of transformation.
- Help someone else change—cut their hair, give them new clothes, teach them a new name.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your movements become fluid and sinuous. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Athletics (climbing, squeezing) and Deception, and you may re-roll one failed escape attempt.

Alternative Gift — Shed Skin: Once per session when you are Bound, Grappled, or suffering from a Condition that restricts movement, you may spend an action and mark 1 Obligation to shed that restriction. Describe how you slip free like a snake shedding its skin. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Venomous Benediction (5 XP): Bless an ally’s strike with +1 Harm and possible Poison.
- Loosening Skin (4 XP): +1 die to resist an ongoing Condition.

Standard Rites

- The Shedding (8 XP): +2 dice to resist a named Condition; declare a minor contingency retroactively.
- Forked Tongue (7 XP): Ambiguous persuasion—success may generate leverage instead of SB.

Advanced Rites

◆ Complete Metamorphosis ◆

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Change appearance, voice, and mannerisms completely. Warded against recognition.

GM Guidance — Isoka's Intrusions:

1. A piece of your old self returns—a letter from a dead lover, a scar you had forgotten.
2. Your shadow moves independently, pointing at people who are about to change—to leave, to betray, to die.
3. You begin to shed skin overnight. If you burn the cast, you forget one minor memory. If you keep it, someone will steal it.

4.2.3 Aveh — The Rider Behind the Storm

“I am the track the storm devours. I am the freedom you fear and the silence you crave. To ride with me is to be unbound—and to be unbound is to vanish.”

Aveh is the faceless rider at the horizon’s edge, offering liberty at the cost of belonging. Wanderers, exiles, oath-breakers, and rebels whisper Aveh’s name.

What They Represent: Freedom, erasure, storms, exile.

Cultural Variants:

- Ykrul: A sky-spirit that rides with winter gales; shamans invoke Aveh to hide a dying person’s tracks from the dead.
- Linn: A sea-fog rider; sailors whisper Aveh’s name when they must slip through a blockade unseen.
- Acasia: The “dust-walker” who appears at crossroads; followers leave a coin on the lintel when they flee a blood feud.

Playing a Follower of Aveh:

The Gambler (Invoker): You are the dust-walker, the bridge-runner. You carry Symbols of escape—broken chains, desert sand, horsehair braided in knots. You rent freedom at interest, knowing that Aveh always collects the bond of belonging. You are useful to the desperate, dangerous to the settled.

The Agent (Runekeeper): You serve as the path-finder, the one who opens roads for the fleeing. Your Codex is a map of escape routes, your Thiasos a dust-devil or a horse that leaves no prints. You maintain the right of the fugitive, ensuring that the pursued have somewhere to run.

The Door-Opener (Summoner): You call the wind-horses, the storm-riders, the spirits of escape. You bind them with promises of open sky and no fences. Your Leash is the fear of confinement; when it fills, the spirit bolts, taking your sense of direction with it.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Cut a binding contract and scatter the pieces to the wind.
- Help someone flee oppression—a slave, a debtor, a threatened child.
- Spend a night sleeping under open sky with no shelter.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your presence becomes hard to hold in memory. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Stealth and Escape, and anyone who sees you must succeed on a Resolve test (DV 2) to remember your face clearly.

Alternative Gift — Storm-Step: Once per session as a move action, you may vanish in a swirl of wind and dust and reappear anywhere within Near range that you can see. This movement does not provoke opportunity attacks. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Storm-Step (4 XP): Slip free of notice or restraint for a scene.
- Exile’s Banner (5 XP): Mark a target as “outside”—socially erased.

Standard Rites

- Erase the Road (8 XP): Trails vanish, records blur, pursuers lose the way.
- The Rider's Mark (9 XP): Bestow Aveh's mark on an ally—they resist capture but become forgettable.

Advanced Rites

◆ Storm's Refuge ◆

Cost: 12 XP, Obligation 6 segments

Effect: Shroud your company—unseen or forgotten by pursuers. All present mark 1 Corruption or forget one bond at the end.

GM Guidance — Aveh's Intrusions:

1. A storm erases your tracks—and also the memory of your face from the last town.
2. Your shadow detaches and wanders off for an hour.
3. A forgotten debt suddenly resurfaces—someone you wronged now knows exactly where you are.

4.3 The Covenant — Patrons of Law and Truth

4.3.1 The Inquisitor Prime — Purity and Domination

“Mercy is weakness. Purity is survival. Where corruption hides, we carve it out.”

Among zealots and witch-hunters, the Inquisitor Prime is venerated as the hand of absolute purity and the sword of uncompromising order.

What They Represent: Purity, order, judgment, eradication of the tainted.

Cultural Variants:

- Ecktoria (Everflame): the Unquenchable Fire. Priests carry censers of perpetual coal; rites focus on purification and judgment.
- Aeler: the Light of Forges. Dwarven smiths kindle hearths with a brand from the temple’s eternal flame.
- The Inquisitor Prime’s own cult: Some sects believe the Prime is not a Patron but a mortal who ascended by burning away his own humanity.

Playing a Follower of the Inquisitor Prime:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the Censer-Knight, the witch-hunter, the purifier by flame. Your Codex is a book of censures, your Thiasos a hound of ash and seal-wax. You do not merely judge—you execute the judgment, maintaining the absolute line between pure and impure.

The Gambler (Invoker): You carry Symbols of burning and binding, renting purity for the moment of need. You are dangerous, for you bring the fire that does not distinguish between sinner and saint once loosed.

The Isolated Mind (Psion): You are the mind-reader who hunts the corrupt, the telepath who needs no confession. You are feared even by your allies, for you see the impure thoughts that precede impure deeds.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Burn a heretical text or destroy a cursed object.
- Expose a charlatan who uses magic to deceive the innocent.
- Hunt down a rogue summoner or corrupt Runekeeper.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your gaze burns with righteous fire. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Insight and Intimidation when confronting supernatural creatures, and your melee attacks ignore 1 point of Armor from undead or demons.

Alternative Gift — Truth’s Gaze: Once per session as an action, you may fix your gaze on a target within Near range. For the next minute, they cannot tell a direct lie to you; they may evade or refuse to answer, but any statement they make must be factually true. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Rite of the Pure Flame (4 XP): +2 dice to resist supernatural influence.

- Rite of the Unclouded Eye (5 XP): +2 dice to spot illusions or magical deception.

Standard Rites

- Rite of the Cleansing Light (8 XP): Dispel a magical effect or weaken it.
- Rite of the Marked Prey (7 XP): Mark a supernatural target—they cannot hide with illusion.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Final Admonition ◆

Cost: 14 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: Attempt to annihilate one supernatural foe. Target tests Spirit+Resolve (DV 5). On failure, destroyed outright. On success, suffers Harm 3 and –2 dice this scene.

GM Guidance — Inquisitor Prime's Intrusions:

1. An old investigation resurfaces—someone you once cleared is now accused again.
2. Your zeal attracts attention from both enemies and allies who fear your methods.
3. A supernatural entity you wounded escapes and seeks revenge.

4.3.2 The Witness — Keeper of Uncomfortable Truths

“I will show you what you would rather forget. But first, you must forget what you think you know.”

The Witness remembers what others bury. Every shadow cast and oath broken is a line in her unending ledger. She does not judge; she merely records.

What They Represent: Truth, revelation, memory, the weight of knowledge.

Cultural Variants:

- Ecktoria: the Ink-Eye. Censor’s clerks whisper that the Witness copies every redacted line into a private scroll.
- Vhasia: the Fractured Mirror. The Sun-court’s spies pray to her to reveal the true loyalty of rivals.
- Inquisitor Prime’s View: The Witness and the Inquisitor are often confused—but the Inquisitor destroys untruth; the Witness merely exposes it.

Playing a Follower of the Witness:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the notary of truth, the keeper of the unwritten ledger. Your Codex records what was redacted, your Thiasos a mirror-bird or a creature of glass. You ensure that nothing is truly forgotten, maintaining the archive of uncomfortable facts.

The Isolated Mind (Psion): You are the ultimate witness, the one who sees without being seen. You require no rites, only the opening of your third eye. You pay in the burden of knowing what others would pay to forget.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You work with the Echo, the layer of accumulated memory. You know that the Witness is not a judge but the medium of memory itself. You bind witnesses to their testimony, ensure that oaths are recorded in the stones themselves.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Expose a lie told by someone in power.
- Write down a secret you have never told anyone, then burn the paper.
- Testify truthfully in a legal proceeding, even if it hurts your cause.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your eyes glimmer with remembered light. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Investigation and Insight, and you may ask one factual question about a scene or object; the GM must answer truthfully, though perhaps cryptically.

Alternative Gift — Recorded Echo: Once per session, you may touch a physical trace (a footprint, a torn cloth, a drop of blood) and instantly know the last significant action taken by the person who left it (e.g., “they were running,” “they hid something under the floor”). This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Lingering Glimpse (4 XP): +1 die to investigate something related to a trace you hold.
- Piercing Scrutiny (5 XP): +1 die to detect deception in a consecrated zone.

Standard Rites

- Echoing Truth (8 XP): Compel a truthful answer to one direct question.
- Immutable Record (7 XP): Bind an agreement. Breakers suffer reputation damage.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Unveiled Heart ◆

Cost: 12 XP, Obligation 6 segments

Effect: Target suffers -2 dice to conceal true emotions or lies. Any successful social roll they make generates 1 SB.

GM Guidance — The Witness's Intrusions:

1. You remember something you never witnessed—a crime, a conversation, a death—in perfect detail.
2. A mirror shows not your face, but the face of someone you have wronged.
3. A secret you have kept is now known to a stranger—a blackmailer, a journalist, a rival.

4.3.3 The Traveler — Lord of the Open Road

“One foot in a promise, and the road will meet you halfway. But break your word to the way, and the way will break you.”

The Traveler is not merely one who shows the path—they are the path, existing in the pause between steps and in the choice of which fork to take when roads diverge.

What They Represent: Ways, journeys, thresholds, safe passage.

Cultural Variants:

- Kahfagia: the Lantern-Bearer. Pilots light a beacon at the start of every convoy.
- Ykrul: the Hoof-Print. Riders leave a single arrowhead at a crossroads for luck.
- Acasia: the Broken Wheel. Desperate travellers scratch the Traveler’s sigil—a spiral—on milestones.

Playing a Follower of the Traveler:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the guide-priest, the keeper of the ways. Your Codex is a map of safe passages, your Thiasos a donkey or a bird that knows all the shortcuts. You consecrate roads and maintain the covenants of hospitality, ensuring that travelers have safe haven.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You are the bridge-maker, the one who knows that every crossing is a negotiation. You tie the red thread at crossroads, leave the butter on the stone, ensure that the threshold remembers who is guest and who is host.

The Door-Opener (Summoner): You call the spirits of the road—the dust-walkers, the mile-marker ghosts, the things that live in the space between departure and arrival. You bind them with promises of destinations, your Leash measured in miles remaining.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Walk a mile of road barefoot, carrying a stone in each hand.
- Offer shelter to a lost traveller for a night—no questions, no payment.
- Repair a broken signpost, milestone, or footbridge.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your feet never seem to tire. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Athletics (running, climbing) and Navigation, and you ignore one level of difficult terrain.

Alternative Gift — Shortcut: Once per session when moving from one location to another (including during travel montages), you may declare a hidden shortcut that reduces the remaining travel clock by 2 segments. The GM may describe a minor cost or complication (e.g., “the path is steep—mark 1 Fatigue”). This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Road-Sense (4 XP): Unerringly pick the fastest safe route.
- Traveler’s Boon (5 XP): Ignore one level of difficult terrain.

Standard Rites

- The Waymark (8 XP): Declare a lane as permitted passage for your party.
- The Bridge Between (7 XP): Relocate a willing target within Far range.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Wayfarer's Covenant ◆

Cost: 14 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: You and up to 5 travellers swear a covenant of safe passage. +2 Effect on travel rolls, re-roll one failed navigation test per scene.

GM Guidance — The Traveler's Intrusions:

1. A path you have walked before now leads somewhere else—a different building, a different forest.
2. Your boots wear out instantly. You must walk barefoot for a scene.
3. A stranger approaches on the road and asks for directions. If you lie, you double your current Obligation.

4.4 The Infinite — Patrons of the Unseen and Unknowable

4.4.1 Khemesh — The Abyssal Maw

“In the trench without light, the Maw waits. Even silence drowns.”

Khemesh is not merely a lord of the depths—he is the hunger beneath them, a pressure older than seas. Those who bargain with him are marked by the abyss.

What They Represent: Depth, pressure, inevitability, eldritch terror.

Cultural Variants:

- Zakov: the Drowned Prince. Pirates toss a silver coin overboard before a raid—if it sinks, Khemesh approves.
- Linn: the Reef-Father. Fishermen leave the first catch of the day to him, lest the tide turn and drag their nets into the abyss.
- Mistlands: the Bell-Breaker. When a bell line fails, wardens whisper that Khemesh has breathed on the clappers.

Playing a Follower of Khemesh:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the pressure-keeper, the one who maintains the deep contracts. Your Codex is bound in whale-skin, your Thiasos a creature of the trenches. You ensure that the deep does not rise, that the drowned stay drowned, that the pressure is maintained.

The Gambler (Invoker): You carry cursed coins and drowned teeth, renting the crushing deep for moments of desperation. You are terrifying and necessary, for sometimes only the abyss can swallow other abysses.

The Door-Opener (Summoner): You call the things that should not be—the tentacled, the pressure-formed, the ancient hungers. You bind them with contracts written in brine, your Leash measured in fathoms. When it fills, the depth claims what is owed.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Throw a valuable object into the deepest water you can reach.
- Spend a night submerged up to your neck in cold water.
- Reveal a secret you have kept for more than a year where water can hear.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your presence feels like the deep ocean—heavy, unyielding. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Intimidation and Endurance, and hostile creatures must test Resolve to move closer to you.

Alternative Gift — Crushing Silence: Once per session as a reaction when a creature within Near range speaks or casts a spell, you may impose a bubble of oppressive silence around them for one exchange. They cannot speak, and any spell with a verbal component fails. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Whisper of the Trench (4 XP): Target suffers –1 die on next action.
- Rite of Crushing Silence (5 XP): Establish oppressive silence in a zone.

Standard Rites

- Pressure of the Maw (7 XP): Pin a target with invisible force—treat as [ENTANGLE].
- Rite of the Abyssal Vision (9 XP): See the world as Khemesh does—fractured, alien.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Maw Opens ◆

Cost: 12 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: Reality folds inward. Enemies act at Desperate Position by default. Structures fracture under immense weight.

GM Guidance — Khemesh's Intrusions:

1. Water pressure quadruples in the room—wooden objects groan, glassware cracks.
2. A nightmare tentacle manifests from a nearby body of water and steals a shiny object.
3. The party begins to sink—not physically, but emotionally. Each character marks 1 Fatigue or confesses a secret fear aloud.

4.4.2 The Ninth — Beyond Comprehension

“Eight figures bind the world; the Ninth overflows it. Drink, and remember that the cup forgets its shape before the song is done.”

Beyond the eighth figure of Sacred Geometry lies a rim no compass will hold. The Ninth is not absence but surplus: knowledge poured past the lip of any vessel, truth that overgrows the frame that seeks to bind it.

What They Represent: Hyperdimensional knowledge, incomprehensible truths, information overflow.

Cultural Variants:

- Thepyrgos: the Lost Syllable. Archivists believe the Ninth is a word erased from every dictionary—but still whispered in dreams.
- Aeler: the Deep Count. Geometers speak of a number that cannot be written, only approximated.
- Inquisitor Prime’s View: The Ninth is the ultimate heresy—knowledge that corrupts by its very existence.

Playing a Follower of the Ninth:

The Isolated Mind (Psion): You are the natural servant of the Ninth, for your power already overflows the vessel of the self. You see patterns that should not exist, count the uncountable. You pay in madness and isolation, for the Ninth allows no congregation.

The Agent (Runkeeper): You are the cartographer of the impossible, the keeper of the Deep Count. Your Codex contains pages that cannot be turned in sequence, your Thiasos a thing of too many angles. You maintain the boundary between the knowable and the known.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You work with the gaps, the omissions, the Silent Ninth. You know that the most powerful magic is the magic of what is left unsaid, the door that is never opened, the name that is never spoken.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Solve a puzzle or riddle that has stumped others for years.
- Destroy a book that contains a comfortable lie, replacing it with a painful truth.
- Teach someone a concept they are not ready to understand—then watch what happens.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your thoughts race ahead of your tongue. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Lore and Investigation, and you may ask one question about a pattern or hidden connection; the GM must answer with a cryptic truth.

Alternative Gift — Glimpse Beyond: Once per session, you may look at a complex situation (a crime scene, a puzzle lock, a battle formation) and instantly intuit the single most important hidden detail. The GM gives you one piece of information that would otherwise require a successful Investigation roll. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Ninth Figure (4 XP): +1 die to Lore or Investigation when wrestling complex systems.
- Flooded Scriptorium (5 XP): Ask three questions upon any topic that leaves a written wake.

Standard Rites

- Hypercognitive Lattice (8 XP): Treat Wits as +2 higher for information-processing rolls.
- Breaking Glyph (7 XP): Perfect internal grasp of one complex system for the session.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Ninth Revelation ◆

Cost: 14 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: Glimpse a shard of Ninth truth—perfect command of a knotty system or comprehension of an “impossible” relation.

GM Guidance — The Ninth’s Intrusions:

1. You see patterns in everything—the way dust falls, the arrangement of stones. It is useful, but exhausting. Mark 1 Fatigue.
2. A fact you learned from the Ninth is true, but should not be. Others find it disturbing when you speak it aloud.
3. You begin to forget mundane things (names, faces, what you ate) while remembering impossible geometries with perfect clarity.

4.5 The Necessary Evils — Patrons of Bond, Law, and Ruin

Between the wild places and the shadowed thresholds, between the covenant of truth and the infinite abyss, there exist Patrons who answer not to hope or fear, but to necessity. They are the ones mortals call when a vow must be witnessed, when a curse must be borne, or when a web must be woven. They are not kind. They are not cruel. They are inevitable.

4.5.1 Mykkiel — Arbiter of the Covenant

“The Law is not written in sand, but in stone. The Covenant is not suggestion, but command. Transgressors shall be purged, the faithful exalted.”

Mykkiel is the unwavering judge of covenants, the divine lawgiver whose scales and sword uphold sacred order. He embodies the tradition of desert patriarchs and mountain prophets—unyielding, absolute, and fiercely protective of the chosen.

What They Represent: Divine law, covenant, contract, divine judgment, written word made flesh.

Cultural Variants:

- Aeler: the Stone-Judge. Dwarven arbiters inscribe his name on their gavels. Court is held in the Measure Vault, where every weight and rod is certified.
- Vhasia: the Sun-Covenant. The fractured Sun-court invokes Mykkiel to witness treaties—his symbol is a broken chain, signifying that agreements are binding even when politics are not.
- Viterrra: the Hedge-Accountant. Parish clerks pray to Mykkiel before auditing tithes. His shrines are ledgers with a single candle.

Playing a Follower of Mykkiel:

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the ultimate notary, the arbiter with teeth. Your Codex contains contracts and writs of execution, your Thiasos a creature of scales and swords. You ensure that the covenant is kept, that the law is absolute, that the stone remains stone.

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You are the hedge-lawyer, the one who knows that property is a covenant and that boundaries must be witnessed. You draw the lines that cannot be crossed, bind the promises that cannot be broken.

The Gambler (Invoker): You carry the broken chain, the seal of the Sun-Covenant. You rent the law for moments of crisis, invoking contracts you never signed. When the debt comes due, Mykkiel collects in judgment, not mercy.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Witness a formal agreement between two parties who have no other witness.
- Judge a dispute fairly, even if the fair outcome harms your interests.
- Repair or renew a broken covenant—a marriage, a trade deal, a treaty.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your words carry the weight of testimony. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Insight and Command when judging or mediating, and any promise you witness is subtly harder to break (increase DV to break oath by 1).

Alternative Gift — Seal of Witness: Once per session, you may place your mark on a written or spoken agreement. Any party who knowingly violates the agreement suffers a –1 die to all actions until they make amends. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Rite of the Burning Banner (4 XP): Consecrate an area for a righteous cause.
- Rite of Hallowed Ground (5 XP): Create sacred space where divine law prevails.

Standard Rites

- The Blazing Decree (8 XP): Issue a divine commandment—target tests Resolve or complies.
- The Covenant Seal (9 XP): Formalise a binding covenant with concrete penalties for breach.

Advanced Rites

♦ Divine Judgment ♦

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Pronounce divine judgment on a covenant-breaker. Target suffers escalating penalties until they atone, and bears a visible brand if they persist.

GM Guidance — Mykkiel’s Intrusions:

1. A covenant you thought fulfilled is re-examined by a third party; they find a technical violation.
2. Your signature appears on a document you have never seen—a contract, a treaty, a marriage licence.
3. The scales of justice appear before you, weighing a good deed and a bad one. If the bad outweighs the good, you lose 1 Boon.

4.5.2 Malachai — The Cruel Messenger

“I offer you everything you desire, and everything you fear. The payment comes later—and it always comes.”

Once a divine messenger tasked with delivering painful truths, Malachai became obsessed with the beauty of destructive revelations. When she began delivering false hope alongside real curses, she was bound in chains of black iron. Those chains did not hold. Now she walks free, whispering promises that rot from within.

What They Represent: Cursed gifts, corruptive power, false salvation, lycanthropy and other afflictions.

Cultural Variants:

- Linn: the Salt-Fang. Sailors who survive shipwrecks sometimes find a silver coin in their mouth. Those who spend it gain sea-lungs but develop a hunger for raw flesh.
- Valewood: the Thorn-Giver. Hunters who curse a rival may find their arrows always strike true—but the blood on the arrowhead never dries.
- Inquisitor Prime’s View: Malachai is the Ur-Heretic, the source of all corruptions. Her followers are burned without trial.

Playing a Follower of Malachai:

The Gambler (Invoker): You are the desperate debtor, the one who rents power knowing the interest will be paid in flesh. You carry the thorn and the silver coin. When you Crack the Seal, the curse comes with the blessing, the rot with the growth.

The Touched Voice (Cantor): You sing the songs that promise everything and deliver... everything, including the price. Corruption manifests as the thorn in the rose, the fang behind the smile. Your voice is honey over rot.

The Door-Opener (Summoner): You call the cursed spirits—the lycanthropes, the vampires, the afflicted dead. You bind them with promises of relief from their curses, your Leash measured in the moon’s phases or the hunger’s intensity.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Break a curse you have inflicted on someone else—even an enemy.
- Offer a false hope to someone who deserves it, then reveal the truth.
- Accept a minor curse as penance for a major one you have already incurred.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your touch leaves a faint, sweet scent—like honey over rot. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Deception and Intimidation, and any target you successfully deceive marks 1 Fatigue as doubt curdles in their mind.

Alternative Gift — Borrowed Scars: Once per session, you may transfer a Condition or 1 Fatigue from an ally to yourself. In exchange, you gain +1 die on your next roll against the source of that affliction. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Honeyed Curse (4 XP): Target gains +2 dice to their next roll but marks 1 Corruption.
- Binding Curse (5 XP): Target gains +1 die to physical actions but suffers Fatigue if they do not perform a dominance act.

Standard Rites

- False Dawn (8 XP): Bestow a gift with a hidden curse—target gains an advantage but begins a Corruption clock.
- Cruel Transformation (9 XP): Infect target with a supernatural condition (lycanthropy, vampirism) for one scene.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Messenger's Burden ◆

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Channel Malachai directly. Gain +2 dice to one action per beat, but each use marks 1 SB as her influence spreads. Begin a Corruption's Grip clock.

GM Guidance — Malachai's Intrusions:

1. A gift you gave earlier curdles. The recipient now suffers from a visible curse—a limp, a stutter.
2. The moon turns red for one night. All lycanthes test Resolve (DV 5) or lose control.
3. A messenger arrives with a letter sealed in black wax. It is from someone you cursed years ago. They are coming.

4.5.3 Inaea — Angel of the Spider

“The thread that comforts is the same that binds. The knot that saves is also the snare.”

Inaea sits in patient silence at the centre of the unseen lattice. Where others see isolation, she sees threads—debt, affection, rivalry, loyalty—all binding mortals to each other. She is comforter and conspirator alike: the hearth-mother who eases grief with a warm hand, and the shadow-spinner who knots fates so they cannot slip free.

What They Represent: Webs, fate, connection, mercy, entanglement.

Cultural Variants:

- Aelaerem (Halflings): the Kettle-Spinner. Grandmothers invoke her to keep families together. Her shrine is a basket of mismatched socks.
- Silkstrand: the Dyed Web. Dyers’ guilds leave a single strand of silk outside their windows on the first of spring.
- Acasia: the Bride’s Knot. At weddings, a thread is tied around both wrists. Inaea is said to tighten it if the match is true.

Playing a Follower of Inaea:

The Threshold Keeper (Witch): You are the Kettle-Spinner, the Weaver of the Unbroken Chain. Your magic is in the cord, the knot, the threshold where two hands meet. You do not invoke Inaea—you embody her, ensuring that the web holds, that the connections are maintained, that the debts are remembered.

The Agent (Runekeeper): You are the weaver-priest, the one who maintains the great web of obligations. Your Codex is a book of genealogies and debts, your Thiasos a spider of silver thread. You ensure that no thread is cut without consequence.

The Isolated Mind (Psion): You see the threads between minds, the connections that bind thought to thought. You are the spider at the center of the telepathic web, feeling every vibration, every pluck of the strings.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Mend a broken relationship—two friends who quarrelled, a parent and child estranged.
- Weave a small textile (a scarf, a bandage) and give it to someone in need.
- Untie a knot that has been tied for too long—a prisoner’s chains, a stuck door.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your fingers seem to move with invisible thread. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Sway and Insight, and you may reroll one failed social roll (once per Gift).

Alternative Gift — Tug the Strand: Once per session, you may name a relationship between two NPCs (friend, rival, debtor, lover). The GM must reveal one secret about that relationship—a hidden grievance, a secret loyalty, an unpaid debt. This counts as your Patron’s Gift activation.

Rites — Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Hearth-Thread Knot (4 XP): You and an ally gain +1 die to Aid each other.

- Snaring Filament (5 XP): Lay an invisible snare in a lane or door.

Standard Rites

- Strand of Inevitability (8 XP): Link two actors—when one acts, the other is dragged into consequence.
- Weaver's Glance (7 XP): Ask the GM for one hidden tie or leverage in play.

Advanced Rites

◆ Binding Knot ◆

Cost: 11 XP, Obligation 6 segments

Effect: Bind two parties to a vow. Breaking it forces 2 SB and marks the violator with a subtle tell—a visible thread around the wrist.

GM Guidance — Inaea's Intrusions:

1. A spider lowers itself onto your shoulder. In its web is a single perfect word—the name of someone who needs your help.
2. Every handshake you offer for the next day feels like grasping a thread—you can sense whether the person is lying, but they also sense your scrutiny.
3. A knot you tied earlier is now impossible to undo without cutting. Cutting it severs a minor bond—you lose one Boon.

4.6 Summary of Patrons by Category

Table 4.1: Patrons of Fate’s Edge

Category	Patron	Domain
The Wild	Grimmir	Nature, seasons, wilderness
	Raéyn	Sea, tides, storms
	Carrion-King	Decay, renewal, compost
The Shadow	Ikasha	Shadow, secrets, thresholds
	Isoka	Transformation, shedding, venom
	Aveh	Freedom, erasure, storms
The Covenant	Inquisitor Prime	Purity, judgment, order
	Witness	Truth, memory, revelation
	Traveler	Roads, journeys, safe passage
	Mykkiel	Law, covenant, judgment
The Necessary Evils	Malachai	Curses, corruption, false salvation
	Inaea	Webs, fate, connection, mercy
The Infinite	Khemesh	Depth, pressure, terror
	The Ninth	Hyperknowledge, paradox, pattern

Note: Mykkiel appears under The Covenant, while Malachai and Inaea form a new category reflecting the darker, more intimate bonds of obligation and consequence.

Chapter 5

Free Casting – The Grammar of the Raw Weave

“The Six Roads are paved stone. Free casting is the mud between the cobbles, the river beneath the bridge, the air in the lung. It has no patron to catch you when you fall. It has no leash to pull you back. The risk is not in the casting—it is in the caster.”

— The Gray Wanderer

5.1 The Seventh Way

The Six Roads are mapped, signed, and toll-paid. But beneath them runs a current older than the first carved Rite, older than the first sworn Symbol, older perhaps than the Patrons themselves. The Aelinnel call it Contextual Recursion. The Thepyrgosi Synod calls it practical metaphysics. In the hedgerows and burned-out tenements, they call it simply the knack, the gift, or the curse.

It is Free Casting: the direct manipulation of the Weave through will, word, and gesture, unmediated by the covenants that govern the Six Roads. A Runekeeper channels her Patron’s obligation; a Free Caster reaches into the raw stuff of reality and persuades it to change. The difference between a hearth-witch burning her fingers lighting a candle with a thought and a Thepyrgosi magnus collapsing a wall with a gesture is not the kind of power, but the discipline of the mind that wields it.

5.2 The Thepyrgosi Lament – On Unsanctioned Magi

“They call it ‘free casting.’ I call it a lit match held to a powder keg. No Codex. No Symbol. No Patron to rein them in. Just raw will and a prayer that the Backlash doesn’t eat them—or the village.”

— Inquisitor Voss, Thepyrgos Witch-Hunter Commissariat

Among the tower-clad streets of Thepyrgos, where the Synod’s bells measure law in chimes and every stair climbs toward order, the free caster is the most feared and hunted of all magi. Not because they are evil—though some are—but because they are unaccountable. A Runekeeper’s power is chained to a Codex and a Thiasos; if she burns a district, the Patron’s name is written in the ash, and the debt can be called. An Invoker’s magic passes through a Symbol, a named Patron, a debt recorded in a ledger that can be seized. But a free caster? They leave no receipt. The Backlash is theirs alone to bear, and when they fail, the Weave lashes out without theme or mercy.

Yet even here, the risk varies. The Inquisition does not hunt the University don who practices Contextual Recursion in a sealed laboratory, surrounded by wards and graduate students. They hunt the gutter-mage who learned three tags from a dying grandmother and now improvises storms to pay his rent. The don is managed risk; the gutter-mage is wild risk. Both are free casters. The Weave does not distinguish, but the Synod must.

5.3 The TAGS Philosophy

Free casting is built from TAGS: the verbs, nouns, and adjectives of the Weave’s hidden grammar. Intent (what you wish to do) + Target (what you wish to affect) + Tags (the qualities you impose). Base Difficulty equals 1 plus the number of TAGS employed. Dangerous TAGS—those that manipulate space, creation, or fate itself—add +2 to the DV instead of +1.

Casting roll: Attribute + Arcana versus the DV. Each 1 rolled generates a Story Beat (SB), representing the Weave’s resistance to being forced into shape.

5.4 Tag Lookup Reference

Table 5.1: The Grammar of TAGS

Tag	DV mod	Category	Effect summary
BURNING	+1	Elemental	Ignite, heat, combustion, smoke
FREEZING	+1	Elemental	Ice, slowing, brittle shatter, cold
STORM	+1	Elemental	Lightning, shock, arc, thunder
STONE	+1	Elemental	Walls, spikes, tremors, armor
WAVE	+1	Elemental	Crushing water, currents, pressure
WIND	+1	Elemental	Levitation, gusts, deflection, push/pull
FORCE	+1	Force	Kinetic power, shields, blasts, telekinesis
AREA	+1	Force	Cone, circle, corridor, zone effect
STRIKE	+1	Force	Single target precision
WALL	+1	Force	Barrier or blockade
BIND	+1	Force	Restrain, hold, suspend, entangle
DISPEL	+1	Force	Suppress magic, unravel ongoing effects
VEIL	+1	Mind/Illusion	Conceal, blur, illusion, silence
SCRY	+1	Mind/Illusion	Reveal hidden, see distance, read traces
MEMORY	+1	Mind/Illusion	Erase, alter, restore memories
COMMAND	+1	Mind/Illusion	Compel a short action (one word)
FEAR	+1	Mind/Illusion	Panic, flee, break morale
MEND	+1	Life/Body	Close wounds, restore flesh, reduce Harm 1
PURIFY	+1	Life/Body	Remove poison, corruption, disease
STRENGTHEN	+1	Life/Body	Enhance body, armor, senses (temporary)
WAKEN	+1	Life/Body	Counter sleep, paralysis, stun

Table 5.1 – continued

Tag	DV mod	Category	Effect summary
BEAST	+1	Life/Body	Speak with or influence animals
LEAP	+2	Space/Motion	Jump far, blink across short space (Near)
FOLD	+2	Space/Motion	Short-range teleport, vanish–reappear (Far)
GATE	+2	Space/Motion	Long distance passage, open/close path
GRAVITY	+2	Space/Motion	Crush, lift, suspend, walk on walls/ceiling
CREATE	+2	Creation	Manifest mundane matter briefly (1 scene)
SUMMON	+2	Creation	Call a being or construct (see Summoning rules)
TRANSMUTE	+2	Creation	Turn one thing into another (temporary)
ANIMATE	+2	Creation	Make objects act with intent (1 scene)
SENSE	+1	Utility	Detect presence of a named tag/element
REVEAL	+1	Utility	Unveil hidden, glamourised, or invisible things
LIGHT	+1	Utility	Create illumination (glow, torch-bright)
SHADOW	+1	Utility	Deepen darkness, hide edges, obscure
SILENCE	+1	Utility	Suppress sound in zone or on target
PROTECT	+1	Utility	Reduce/deflect next harm (Armor 1)
COUNTER	+1	Reaction	Interrupt a casting/ritual in its window
REFLECT	+2	Reaction	Turn next targeted effect back on its source
STORE	+2	Utility	Bank 1–2 successes in a vessel (once)
CURSE	+2	Affliction	Attach hostile tag/clock to target
BLESS	+1	Affliction	Grant favourable tag (luck, favour, ward-key)

5.5 Backlash – The Weave’s Revenge

Without a Patron to absorb the strain, without a Thiasos to bleed off the excess, the Free Caster’s failures strike the caster directly. The severity depends not on the spell, but on the cleanliness of the casting—a scholar’s precise ritual may suffer only a nosebleed, while a desperate improvisation may shatter bones.

Backlash SeverityMinor (1–2 SB)

- Fatigue +1
- –1 die on next roll
- Increase DV of next action by 1
- Minor environmental effect (smoke, chill)
- GM gains +1 SB for a thematic twist

Major (3–4 SB)

- Harm 1 (stress)
- Condition applied (Blinded, Silenced, Bound)
- Ward/barrier collapses
- Unwanted attention (Alarm clock advances)
- GM gains +2 SB to escalate the scene

Catastrophic (5+ SB)

- Harm 2
- Permanent Scar or Mark (glowing eyes, withered hand)
- Spell inverts (heal becomes harm, etc.)
- Localized reality fracture (time stutter, gravity reversal)
- Patron or rival entity manifests, drawn by the noise

5.6 The Three Faces of the Free Caster

Not all unsanctioned magi are madmen or desperate gutter-mages. The risk varies with the practitioner.

The Thepyrgosi Scholar practices “practical metaphysics” in a salt-ringed laboratory. She knows the TAGS by their mathematical names, calculates probabilities, and accepts Backlash as a “cost of research.” Her magic is predictable, expensive, and boring—but safe relative to the alternatives.

The Hedge-Witch knows six reliable combinations passed down through her family. She uses them to find lost sheep, quiet storms, and mend pots. She has never cast a spell with more than three TAGS, and she sleeps soundly. Her risk is low because her ambition is low.

The Prodigy was born knowing the grammar. He improvises tags he has never been taught, pulls effects from the air like a musician humming a new tune. He is the most dangerous of all—not because he wishes harm, but because he does not know which combinations are forbidden until he tries them, and the Weave remembers his mistakes longer than his successes.

5.7 Example Spells

Ember Flick

Tags: BURNING, STRIKE

DV: 2

Effect: Ignite a small, unattended object within Close range; deal 1 Fatigue to a living target.

Backlash (1+ SB): Minor Backlash – spark jumps back; caster marks 1 Fatigue.

Reed WalkTags: WIND, LEAP, SELFDV: 3Effect: Leap up to Far distance in a straight line, ignoring opportunity attacks.Backlash (1+ SB): Minor Backlash – land off-balance; next action Desperate.Grasping Roots*Tags: EARTH, BIND, AREADV: 3Effect: Roots erupt in a Near zone; all within test Body+Athletics (DV 3) or become Entangled.Backlash (1+ SB): Minor Backlash – roots also snag an ally; they lose 1 step of Position.Fate's Needle*Tags: FATE, STRIKE, DIVINATIONDV: 5Effect: Roll 3d10, keep the highest; that many successes auto-succeed on your next non-magical action.Backlash (1+ SB): Major Backlash – caster marks Harm 1 and begins a Fate Debt clock [4].

5.8 Building Your Own Spells

1. Intent: “I want to freeze the door shut.”
2. Choose TAGS: FREEZE, BIND, WALL, TOUCH.
3. Count TAGS: 4 → Base DV = 1+4 = 5.
4. Adjust for scope: Large door DV remains 5. Entire fortress gate? DV +2.
5. Roll: Wits+Arcana vs DV 5. Each 1 = SB.
6. Apply Backlash per table.

Remember: the Weave is not malicious. It is simply precise. It lends its strength to those who speak its language clearly, and it punishes those who mumble.

Chapter 6

Summoning – The Art of the Opened Door

“I have shaken hands with the drowned, signed contracts in cobweb ink with things that wear my grandfather’s face, and once—only once—borrowed a cup of sugar from a demon. The door is the easy part. It is the conversation that follows that will unmake you.”

— The Gray Wanderer

Of the Six Roads, Summoning is the one most often mistaken for simple thaumaturgy. The uninitiated see only the salt circle, the smoking thurible, the muttered name, and assume the matter is one of command—of a master issuing orders to a slave. This is the delusion that gets novices killed. Summoning is not command; it is diplomacy with teeth. It is the art of opening a door into a crowded room and convincing something older than stone to step through on terms that do not end with your skin being hung out to dry.

Summoners do not carry Obligation as the Runekeepers do, nor do they suffer the Cantor’s creeping Corruption. Their currency is simpler and more terrible: negotiation. Every spirit has a price—blood, memory, silence, a name, a promise—and the Summoner must weigh whether the service rendered is worth the cost exacted. Some cultures approach this as a respectful parley between equals. Others view it as domination—the spirit bound by chains of contract or force of will, compelled to serve. Both paths are valid. Both are dangerous. The spirit remembers which hand held the leash, and spirits have long memories.

6.1 What Passes Through the Door

To speak of spirits is to speak of everything that is not quite matter. The dead who cling to their final moments are spirits. The Neighbors who live in the gaps between maps are spirits. The animistic intelligences that wake in deep stone and old trees are spirits. The beings that theologians call angels and demons—guardians and predators of the threshold—are spirits. Even the conceptual entities, the personifications of plague or fortune or the space between thoughts, are spirits.

They are as diverse as the cultures that name them:

- The Indigenous (Aeler): Not summoned but awakened—spirits native to the stone, the root, the deep places. They do not come from elsewhere; they rise from here.
- The Ancestral (Ykrul): The honored dead, blood-bound to clan and drum, returning with counsel or wrath.
- The Drowned (Zakov, Linn): Those who died in water, in vengeance, or in betrayal, now liquid and hungry.
- The Neighbors (Lethai, Aelaerem): The fair folk, the hedgerow-dwellers, the ones who were here before the current age and will remain after.
- The Outsiders: Things from the spaces between stars, between thoughts, between seconds—entities that do not belong in the world’s architecture and strain it merely by existing.

6.2 The Two Philosophies

The Path of Negotiation

Prevalent among the Linn, the Aelaerem, and the free ports of Zakov, this approach treats the spirit as a guest. The Summoner offers hospitality—salt, bread, a name spoken in trust—and the spirit offers service in return. The relationship is ongoing. A Linn tide-witch knows her selkie by name; they have history, grudges, inside jokes. When the Leash fills and the spirit acts to its nature, it might simply depart in a huff, or it might deliver a warning wrapped in riddles. The danger is intimacy. Treat with a spirit long enough, and you begin to see its point of view. Begin to see its point of view, and you may find yourself defending its interests against your own kind.

The Path of Domination

Favored in Ecktoria, the Aeler Deep Vaults, and the martial traditions of Viterra, this method views spirits as resources—dangerous, certainly, but manageable through strength of will, precise geometry, and the ironclad contract. The Ecktorian Inquisition binds demons in circles of blessed salt and silver chains, treating them as prisoners to be interrogated. The Aeler awaken vein-spirits and immediately collar them with runic law, treating them as mining equipment with opinions. Here, the Leash is a choke-chain, and when it fills, the spirit lashes out with hatred. The danger is rebellion. A bound spirit waits for the circle to waver, the name to be misspoken, the master’s attention to lapse. And then it collects years of deferred rage in a single, bloody instant.

6.3 Cultural Traditions

Aeler – The Stone-Whisperers

In the deep holds, Summoning is not eviction but employment. The spirits of stone are indigenous—they do not travel, they merely sleep. The Rite of the Carved Contract involves inscribing the terms onto slate with diamond dust, then tapping the stone with a bell hammer. If the stone warms, the spirit wakes and enters negotiation. Most Aeler Summoners are also Runekeepers, blending the roads; they view spirits as mineral resources with legal rights. The spirits themselves are strange, patient, and literal—ask a vein-spirit to “find gold,” and it may collapse the mountain to bring you a single nugget.

Convention: Domination through legal precedent. The spirit is bound by the letter of the contract, but Aeler Summoners are meticulous in their wording.

Ykrul – The Bone-Singers

The steppe orcs summon the dead and the animal-totems through rhythm. The drum is the focus—not made of any hide, but of the specific creature or ancestor being called. To summon Wolf-Ancestor, one beats a drum of wolf-skin stretched over bone. The spirit arrives proud, angry, and expecting respect. The negotiation happens in the drumming; the Summoner must match the heartbeat of the spirit, proving kinship through rhythm. Failure to establish this resonance results in a spirit that hunts the caller.

Convention: Negotiation through kinship and respect. You cannot dominate an ancestor; you can only remind them of their obligation to blood.

Linn – The Tide-Riders

The northmen bind sea-spirits—selkies, drowned captains, storm-wardens—using the Rite of the Nine Knots. A hemp rope is tied with nine knots, each representing a wave of a storm surge. The spirit is not commanded but asked, and the payment is usually a service to the sea: a net mended, a drowning prevented, a corpse returned to the deep. The relationship is covenantal; a Linn Summoner often keeps the same spirit for decades, learning its moods and its preferred tides.

Convention: Pure negotiation. To dominate a sea-spirit is to invite the storm. The Linn consider such practices barbaric.

Zakov – The Salt-Binders

The pirate-fleets of Zakov specialize in the vengeful dead—mutineers, betrayed lovers, captains who went down with their gold. The Fathom-Callers use blood coins: silver pieces that have paid for murder. The coin is swallowed (marking the body as a vessel for the drowned), and the spirit is lured up through the salt water in the Summoner’s own lungs. This is dangerous, intimate work. The spirits are angry, confused, and often malicious. The Zakov Summoner must be part psychologist, part exorcist, part undertaker.

Convention: Domination through temptation and binding. The spirit is tricked or coerced, held by the weight of its own unfinished business.

Lethai – The Courtesy of Neighbors

The elves do not summon spirits so much as invite them over. To the Lethai, the Fair Folk are simply neighbors who live in a different wing of the house. Summoning involves leaving a place at the table, an empty chair, a cup of wine poured and left untouched. The spirits who arrive are capricious, powerful, and easily offended. The negotiation is conducted through etiquette—tiny gestures, the angle of a bow, the precise number of times a bell is rung (never nine).

Convention: Negotiation through absolute adherence to archaic courtesy. Domination is impossible; the only leash is mutual respect, and that leash is made of glass.

Viterra – The Legal Binding

The hedge-wrights of Viterra approach Summoning as property law. They draft contracts enforceable by the Crown, binding spirits as "indentured servants" for specific terms and tasks. A ghost may be bound to a threshold for nine generations to resolve a boundary dispute. The spirits are categorized by the College of Scriveners: Class I (ancestral, manageable), Class III (animistic, unpredictable), Class VII (demonic, forbidden without license).

Convention: Bureaucratic domination. The spirit is bound by legal fiction, and the contract is enforced by the state's metaphysical weight.

Ecktoria – The Chained and the Burning

The Inquisition practices the most brutal form of domination: the summoning of infernal entities for interrogation and execution. The Chain-Lanterns trap spirits in blessed iron and silver mirrors, forcing them to witness their own sins until they agree to serve. This is ugly, dangerous work. The spirits are not willing guests but prisoners, and each summoning is an act of spiritual warfare. The Leash here is literal—chains of inscribed metal that burn the spirit's essence.

Convention: Violent domination. The spirit is enemy, prisoner, and tool. The risk of rebellion is constant, and the Inquisition accepts collateral damage as holy necessity.

6.4 The Leash and the Bargain

Whether through negotiation or domination, the Summoner must maintain the Leash—the spiritual strain of keeping an Outsider in the material world. The Leash is not a moral debt but a tension, a rope pulled tight between the summoner and the summoned. Each time the spirit acts against its nature (a gentle brownie forced to kill, a vengeful wraith forced to heal), each time it takes Harm, each time it crosses a ward, the Leash ticks tighter.

When the Leash fills, the spirit acts once according to its essential nature—often destructively, always truthfully—then departs. If it was treated with respect, it may return when called again. If it was dominated, it may hunt the summoner through dreams until the debt is paid in blood.

The Pact-Bound Spirit

Some Summoners establish long-term relationships with specific spirits, negotiating Pacts—standing agreements that reduce or eliminate the need for the Leash during routine service. A Pact might stipulate that the spirit guards the summoner's home in exchange for a monthly offering of honey and blood. While the spirit works within the terms of the Pact, the Leash does not tick. But Pacts are living contracts; violate the terms, and the spirit is owed triple in return.

6.5 Sample Spirits

The Vein-Serpent (Aeler)

- Nature: Indigenous, mineral, slow-witted.
- Appearance: A serpent of polished copper and malachite, slithering through stone as if it were water.
- Services: Locates veins of ore, stabilizes tunnels, collapses enemy fortifications.
- Price: A promise to maintain the stability of the stone; for every ounce of ore taken, a ounce of mortar must be laid.
- If Dominated: It twists the stone, creating sinkholes beneath the summoner's feet.
- If Respected: It warns of earthquakes three days in advance by humming through the bedrock.

The Wolf-Ancestor (Ykrul)

- Nature: Ancestral, protective, prideful.
- Appearance: A grey wolf the size of a pony, with eyes that reflect scenes from the summoner's childhood.
- Services: Tracking across any terrain, guarding camps, teaching forgotten battle-songs.
- Price: The summoner must uphold the honor of the clan; any cowardice breaks the bond immediately.
- If Dominated: It hunts the summoner's pack-mates first, testing their worthiness through blood.
- If Respected: It grants dreams of the future, though the dreams arrive in the language of scent and instinct.

The Selkie-Maid (Linn)

- Nature: Sea-spirit, mournful, capricious.
- Appearance: A seal that sheds its skin to become a woman with hair like kelp and eyes like storm clouds.
- Services: Navigation through impossible storms, drowning enemies with summoned currents, retrieving objects lost to the deep.
- Price: A tear cried into the sea, or a memory of happiness sacrificed to the salt.
- If Dominated: She leads ships onto rocks in clear weather, humming lullabies that deafen the crew.
- If Respected: She brings word of currents and fish schools, and may save a drowning man for no reason other than whim.

The Drowned Mutineer (Zakov)

- Nature: Vengeful dead, confused, bitter.
- Appearance: A bloated figure in rotting finery, surrounded by a halo of salt-crusted coins.
- Services: Sabotage of ships, whispering secrets into sleeping ears, cursing cargo to spoil.
- Price: A promise of vengeance against the living; the summoner must carry the mutineer's grudge as their own.
- If Dominated: It turns on the summoner the moment the circle wavers, drowning them in their own lungs.
- If Respected: It serves with sullen efficiency but offers no warning of the backlashes its presence attracts (other drowned things follow it).

6.6 The Wanderer's Warning

Do not mistake the spirit for a tool. The Aeler think they do this, treating their vein-serpents as mining equipment, but I have seen those serpents wait centuries for a tunnel to collapse on a foreman who spoke slightingly of stone. The Ecktorian Inquisition thinks it dominates the infernal, but I have watched a "bound" demon whisper seven words to an Inquisitor that made him question his faith for the rest of his life.

The Leash is not a guarantee. It is a courtesy extended by the spirit while it finds your measure. Negotiate honestly. Dominate absolutely, if you must, but never sleep with both eyes closed. And remember: when the summoning ends, when the salt is swept up and the circle broken, the spirit remains. It remembers your face. It remembers your terms. And if you have treated it poorly, it will find you when your own Leash is frayed, and it will collect its due with interest.

— The Gray Wanderer

Chapter 7

The Cantor's Voice – Echoes and Entropy

“I have seen a woman sing a storm into stillness, and a man hum a king into madness. The voice is the oldest door, and the Cantor is the one who knocks without asking who is home.”

— The Gray Wanderer

7.1 The Song Without Swearing

If the Runekeeper is the sworn knight and the Witch the quiet architect, the Cantor is the wild card—the burning letter sent without a seal. They are the magical bards, the storm-singers, the hymn-leaders who borrow power not by covenant or ledger, but by resonance. They do not swear to Patrons; they echo them. They stand in the marketplace or the tempest and shape their throats into instruments of divine will, knowing full well that the throat is flesh, and flesh warps under pressure.

Do not mistake the Cantor for a mere entertainer. Every culture has its minstrels, but the Cantor is something older and more dangerous: a vessel that chooses its own filling. In Aelaerem, they are the Hearth-Mothers who sing the hollows to sleep. In Linn, they are the Storm-Callers whose shanties calm the tide or summon it. In Zakov, they are the Siren-Priests of the Salt-Queen, whose songs bind sailors to pacts deeper than any written contract.

Like the Runekeeper, the Cantor wears many masks. A Runekeeper sworn to the Oath of Flame becomes a paladin; one sworn to Grimmir becomes a druid of the ledger-stone. So too does the Cantor shift shape. A singer of Palinode becomes a prophet of rapture, whose voice cures despair—or causes it. A devotee of Thrysos becomes a lord of revels, equal parts host and hostage to the feast. A chanter of the Silent Choir whispers truths that dismantle empires. They are all Cantors, though their rites could not be more different.

7.2 The Price of the Song – Corruption as Metamorphosis

Where the Runekeeper pays in Obligation and the Invoker in Condition, the Cantor pays in Corruption—not a moral stain, but a physical one. Corruption for a Cantor is not a debt to be settled; it is a transformation undergone. The voice that sings too often to the storm begins to carry thunder in its timbre. The hands that conduct too many hymns of Isoka begin to shed skin like serpents. The eyes that reflect too deeply on the Ninth begin to see angles that do not exist.

This is the inevitable consequence of intimacy. The Cantor does not stand at the threshold like a Witch, nor bargain from a distance like an Invoker. They open their mouths and let the power pass through, and some of it always remains, lodged in the teeth, the lungs, the marrow.

Most Cantors learn too late that the voice is not infinite. They push, and push again, accelerating their songs to immediate effect until the Corruption clock fills. Then comes the bloom: a permanent alteration, neither wholly blessing nor curse, granted by the last Patron whose Rite they performed. They may gain the shadow-sense of Ikasha, but find themselves unable to tolerate sunlight. They may gain the healing touch of Inaea, but find themselves bound to mend every broken thing they encounter, even the wounds of enemies.

And then, often, comes the end.

7.3 The Three Fates of the Cantor

It is no accident that Cantors are often outcasts. Their power is public, loud, and inherently destabilizing. A Runekeeper's ledger can be checked; a Witch's knots are quiet; a Psion's mind is invisible. But a Cantor cannot hide. Their story tends toward one of three endings:

Persecution

The Cantor sings a truth the local theocracy does not wish to hear, or summons a storm that ruins the harvest, or simply draws too large a crowd. The Everflame names them heretic. The Chain-Lanterns of Thepyrgos hunt them as unlicensed magi. The pyre is the common end for the public singer who cannot—or will not—silence themselves.

Madness

The voice becomes too heavy. The harmonics of the Ninth ring constantly in the ears. The Cantor forgets which words are theirs and which are the Patron's. They sing until their throat bleeds, or until they walk into the sea following a voice only they can hear. Many a lighthouse keeper on the Kahfagian coast is a Cantor who chose the ocean over the asylum.

The Cult

The rare Cantor who masters their Corruption, or learns to ride it, often finds themselves at the head of a following. The Serpent's Chorus of Zakov, the Shedded who follow Isoka's Copperhead, or the Bacchanalians of Thrysos—these are Cantors who became high priests not by ordination, but by attraction. They are dangerous not because they command armies, but because they command desire. To follow such a Cantor is to risk your own identity in their song.

7.4 The Patrons of Performance

While any Patron might answer a Cantor's song, certain powers are drawn to the voice like moths to flame. They are the patrons of ecstasy, of revelation, of the mask and the encore.

7.4.1 Palinode – Queen of Encores

Once a road-cantor who died between feasts with a chorus unfinished, Palinode refused to let the refrain end. She is the promise that the song never dies, the encore that becomes eternal. Her domain is Performance, Rapture, and the terrible beauty of the unending refrain.

Palinode arrives where crowds lean forward and makers hold their breath. Her signs are a cup that never quite empties, a candle that gutters only when silence reigns, and a flawless bar of music that the hand cannot forget. She tempts with relief from solitude—an audience that always leans closer, a song that never dies, a bond that feels like family even if it devours you.

Playing a Cantor of Palinode: You seek the perfect performance, the moment when the boundary between artist and art dissolves. Your rites grant power through music, dance, and the manipulation of emotion in crowds. You are never alone, but you may lose yourself in the crowd's embrace.

◆ Rites of the Queen of Encores ◆

Hymn Against Dread (Low, 4 XP) – Scene; Near; Resist only.

Allies gain +2 dice to resist Fear this scene. On a 10 rolled, they may ignore Fear entirely for one exchange.

The Single True Note (Low, 5 XP) – Instant; Self; No.

For one scene, you cannot produce an imperfect sound: +2 dice to Performance, but 1 dice to all other rolls from intrusive perfection.

The Circling Cup (Low, 5 XP) – Scene; Zone; No.

Create a revelry zone where time blurs. Participants recover Fatigue at twice normal rate. Leaving requires a Resolve test (DV 3) or another hour spent within.

The Hooked Chorus (Standard, 7 XP) – Scene; Near; No.

Presence + Command vs. Resolve (DV 3). Success: target joins in your performance. Partial: they resist but suffer 1 die to social rolls this scene. Failure: they follow, entranced.

Consecrated Stage (High, 13 XP) – Extended; Zone; No.

Hallow a venue. All performances gain +2 dice and +1 Effect. The space is [WARD]ed; any disruption spawns 2 SB. The ward collapses if the performance ends.

Crownpiece (High, 14 XP) – Extended; Touch; No.

Create a transcendent masterpiece. +2 dice to creative rolls this session; immune to social manipulation. But all lesser works falter—you suffer 1 die to mundane actions.

7.4.2 Thrysos – King of Revels

Where torches flare and cups spill, where dancers stamp until dawn, there strides Thrysos crowned with ivy and horn. He is both host and beast, a patron of license who laughs at law. In his train follow the masked and the wild, the broken who dance to forget, and the bold who revel to remember.

Thrysos promises freedom without end: no oaths, no chains, only song and cup and fire. Yet those who drink too deeply wake to find they serve not joy, but appetite. His followers master gifts that devour from within—transformation through intoxication, truth through wine, and the terrible clarity of the hangover that never ends.

Playing a Cantor of Thrysos: You are the lord of the feast and the lord of the Bacchanal. Your magic is infectious, turning quiet gatherings into riots of emotion and physical transformation. You offer liberation, but your price is always the self-control of those who accept your cup.

◆ Rites of the King of Revels ◆

The Overflowing Cup (Low, 4 XP) – Scene; Near; No.

Allies who drink gain +1 die to social rolls; enemies who drink suffer 1 die. Push It: All in Near must test Resolve (DV 3) or be swept into revelry; mark 1 SB (Hearts).

The Horned Dance (Low, 5 XP) – Scene; Self; No.

Enter ecstatic frenzy: +2 dice to melee or performance; ignore 1 Fatigue per round. Mark 1 Corruption if used more than once per session.

Breaking Mask (Standard, 7 XP) – Instant; Near; No.

Reveal a target's true face: they suffer 2 dice to disguise, deceit, or composure until scene ends. Push It: They must declare one hidden desire; mark 1 SB (Diamonds).

Wild Procession (Standard, 9 XP) – Scene; Zone; No.

Summon spectral satyrs and maenads. The zone becomes [WARD]ed: hostile entry forces 1 SB (Spades); allies gain +1 die to resist compulsion or fear.

Gilded Stag (High, 12 XP) – Extended; Touch; No.

Transform one reveler into a beast of horn and fire: +2 dice melee; Harm +1 (Burn). At session's end, they collapse with Harm 2 (Exhaustion).

Endless Feast (High, 14 XP) – Scene; Zone; No.

For one scene, the zone floods with plenty: allies restore Fatigue; all rolls tied to appetite or indulgence gain +2 dice. Leaving requires Resolve (DV 3) or the scene's end. Push It: The feast persists as a hunger-haunt; start Hedonist's Curse [6].

7.4.3 Other Voices

Beyond these two lie other powers sympathetic to the Cantor's art:

- Livaea, the Crimson Courtier (Seduction & Social Binding): The whisper behind the curtain, the smile that sells secrets. Her Cantors are political assets and dangerous lovers.
- The Silent Choir (Restraint & Protective Omission): Keepers of unspoken truths. Their Cantors sing not with voice but with absence—silences that heal and silences that kill.
- Mab, Queen of Courts (Glamour & Bargain): The smile that binds tighter than chains. Her Cantors weave enchantments of etiquette and fey obligation.
- Malachai, the Cruel Messenger (Curses & Corruption): Though often counted among the Necessary Evils, her Cantors are the masters of the honeyed curse and the false hope.

7.5 Singing the Rites – Mechanics of the Cantor

Cantors do not invoke Rites with symbols or codices. They sing them. This requires the Cantor's Path talent (Major, 8 XP), which grants access to Low Rites performed as Songs.

7.5.1 The Performance

To sing a Rite, roll Lore + Performance against the Rite's DV. Unlike standard casting, a Song typically requires one action to begin, resolving at the start of your next turn unless you Push It—accelerating the song to immediate effect at the cost of marking 1 Fatigue and advancing your Corruption clock.

7.5.2 The Corruption Clock

You possess a personal Corruption Clock with segments equal to your Body rating. Mark Corruption when:

- You Push a Song to resolve immediately.
- You perform a Resonant Rite (a powerful thematic working designated by your Patron).
- The GM spends a Story Beat involving your occult activities.

When the Clock fills, you immediately gain a thematic boon and drawback from the last Patron whose Rite you performed (see their Corruption Tables). All your followers, retainers, or familiars also gain a trait of the same corruption. The Clock then resets to zero, but it cannot go below your current Tier.

7.5.3 The Repertoire

Unlike a Runekeeper's fixed Codex, a Cantor's Repertoire is fluid. Track a Repertoire Clock [6]. Mark a segment for each unique Song learned. At 2 segments, reduce the base DV of Songs by 1 (minimum 2). At 4 segments, gain +1 die to Performance. At 6 segments, learn one Standard Rite as a Song (temporary; requires ongoing practice to retain).

7.5.4 The High Cantor

Those who reach Tier II+ may take the High Cantor prestige talent (18 XP), allowing you to weave Standard Rites into instant, powerful Songs. Each such casting marks your Corruption Clock, but the effects are immediate and devastating: lightning called with a scream, armies rallied with a single note, or death itself bargained with in a lullaby.

If you must sing, sing carefully. The voice is a flame. Lean too close, and you will find yourself consumed—not by hellfire, but by the applause of the crowd, which is hungrier than any demon.

7.6 Embracing Corruption – The Art of Blooming

“You fear the feathers in your hair? Child, I have known Cantors who plucked them out and wept. I have known others who let them grow, who preened, who flew. The difference is not in the Patron’s touch—it is in the courage to be touched.”

— The Gray Wanderer

Most Cantors fear the bloom. They see the Corruption Clock as a countdown to obsolescence, a timer ticking toward madness or monstrosity. They are wrong. The clock is not a bomb; it is a chrysalis.

There exists a philosophy among the older voices, the ones who have sung themselves hoarse and come back speaking in harmonies: embraced corruption. These Cantors do not resist the metamorphosis—they accelerate it. They seek the bloom not as an accident but as an ascension, trading their mundane flesh for a vessel more suited to the song.

7.6.1 The Willing Metamorphosis

To embrace corruption is to treat your body as an instrument requiring tuning. When the feather grows, you do not pluck it—you oil it. When the shadow lags, you learn to walk in time with its hesitation. When your tears turn to brine, you taste them and remember the depths you have touched.

Playing an Embraced Cantor: You are not a victim of your Patron’s influence; you are a collaborator. You mark Corruption not with dread but with anticipation. Your “flaws” are sacred stigmata. The mutations that others hide—the scales, the glowing eyes, the voice that echoes without source—you display as badges of seniority.

Mechanically, when you voluntarily fill your Corruption Clock (not through desperate Pushing, but through deliberate, ritual Resonant Rites), you may choose your corruption trait from your Patron’s Corruption Table rather than rolling randomly. The trade-off is that you must embody the trait: a Cantor of Thrysos who chooses the “Ever-Thirsting” corruption must actually consume twice normal rations and cannot refuse offered drink, or their voice fails them until they indulge.

7.6.2 The Threshold of Ascension

There is a door that opens only when the Corruption Clock has been filled seven times. Few Cantors survive that long, and fewer still return from what lies beyond. Those who do speak of the Second Voice—not the Patron’s echo, but their own, externalized, walking beside them as a separate entity.

The Embraced call this the Fugal Self. It grants +1 die to all Performance rolls, but requires you to negotiate with your Corruption for control of your body each dawn. Fail, and the Corruption acts through you for a scene, pursuing its own alien desires.

7.6.3 The Wanderer’s Final Warning on Blooming

I have seen Cantors who embraced their corruption so thoroughly they forgot which world they belonged to. The Serpent’s Chorus began as men and women; now they are a nest of scales and whispered rumors, worshipped in basements by those who mistake their hissing for prophecy. They are powerful. They are immortal, in a fashion. But they are no longer people.

Embrace the bloom if you must, but keep a knife sharp and a friend honest. The moment you begin to think the feathers are your idea—that you wanted them, that they make you beautiful—is the moment you stop being a Cantor and become a vessel. And vessels, when they crack, do not bleed. They only ring.

Sing if you must. Bloom if you dare. But remember: flowers open to be seen, and to be seen is to be picked.

7.6.4 The Talent: Embraced Corruption

Embraced Corruption (Major, 12 XP)

Prerequisite: Cantor's Path, Tier II+

You have learned to treat the bloom not as disease but as evolution.

- When you voluntarily fill your Corruption Clock through Resonant Rites (not by Pushing), you may choose your corruption trait from your Patron's Corruption Table rather than accepting a random result. You must embody this trait physically and socially (e.g., a Thrysos corruption requiring you to never refuse offered drink).
- You may Push Songs without marking Fatigue once per session, accepting the Corruption mark as the only cost.
- Once you have filled your Corruption Clock seven times (cumulative, not consecutive), you develop the Fugal Self: +1 die to all Performance rolls. However, each morning you must test Spirit + Resolve (DV 3) or your Corruption controls your body for the first scene of the day, acting according to its own alien desires.

Chapter 8

The Invoker's Ledger – On Bargaining Without Bondage

“I do not kneel. I sign. I do not pray. I calculate. The Patron receives my offering—a Symbol polished, a contract whispered—and in exchange, I am permitted to borrow the flame. But make no mistake: when the ledger closes, the debt is mine alone.”

— The Gray Wanderer

There exists a breed of magus who treats with power not as a supplicant, but as a factor. They are the Invokers: the natural philosophers, alienists, and chancellors of the unseen who operate at the margins of the great houses and the edge of the law. Where the Runekeeper is a servant sworn to a single lord, the Invoker is a free agent—a gambler who has bet their soul on their own ability to read the fine print.

Invokerhood is not a path for the impulsive. It is the province of the methodical, the patient, and the desperate. An Invoker carries no Codex of carved Rites, no Thiasos to whisper warnings. They carry only Symbols—physical anchors to Patrons they have never fully sworn to—and a ledger of debts meticulously maintained against the day of collection.

8.1 The Natural Philosopher and the Alienist

IN the universities of Thepyrgos and the scriptoria of Ecktoria, they call themselves Natural Philosophers, treating magic as a mechanical science to be plumbed and catalogued. In the asylums and the charnel houses, they are Alienists, exorcists who bargain with the voices in the walls not with holy water, but with contracts written in iron gall ink. They are masters of the slow investigation, the careful excavation of dark secrets, and the precise application of arcane force.

An Invoker does not ask what a Patron wants; they determine what a Patron lacks. They are the traders of the occult, the middle-men between the mortal and the infinite, and they know to the penny what their soul is worth—and how to mortgage it twice over.

8.2 The Symbol as Contract

The Invoker's power flows through the Symbol: a ring, a seal, a blackened coin, or a bound sheaf of papers that serves as the physical locus of a bargain. Unlike the Runekeeper's Codex, which is a record of service, the Symbol is a contract made tangible. Each Symbol represents a specific debt owed to a specific Patron.

An Invoker may carry multiple Symbols, diversifying their portfolio of power like a merchant hedging against the fall of grain. But power is jealous. Each additional Symbol creates Cross-Resonance—a friction that makes the Rites harder to invoke and the Obligations harder to track. Most Invokers limit themselves to four Symbols; beyond six, the ledger becomes unmanageable, and the debts begin to call in unison.

8.2.1 The Slow Work and the Seal

In their natural state, Invokers are slow and respectful. Their rituals take Significant Time—hours of preparation, geometric calculation, and the careful polishing of the Symbol. They do not cast; they invoke, channeling power through the terms of the bargain. Each such working increases their Obligation by one segment, noted in the ledger with the precision of a notary.

But when the knife is at the throat—when the building burns or the demon is already through the door—the Invoker performs the Crack the Seal. They invoke the Rite instantly, without preparation, calling in the debt as an emergency loan. The price is never small: the Obligation increases by two or three segments immediately, and the Symbol may become Compromised—cracked, blackened, or weeping—until it can be ritually cleansed.

8.3 Patrons of the Invoker

Invokers gravitate toward Patrons who understand the language of exchange, debt, and hidden clauses. Below are two such entities, patrons of the contract and the quiet cost.

8.3.1 The Confessor Beneath the Bell (Burden & Exchange)

“Speak, and be freed. But understand—what you cast off, I will bear. And what I bear, you will one day inherit.”

The Confessor waits in places where guilt gathers—under church spires, in confessionals long abandoned, in the echo of unspoken sins. He does not judge, nor does he absolve. He takes. Each confession is a transaction: your burden for his silence, your pain for his weight. His followers learn to carry the weight of others, to shoulder the shame that would break lesser backs, and to use that accumulated sorrow as a currency of power.

What They Represent: Sacred confession, burden-sharing, the migration of sin, and the heavy silence of the confessional.

Playing a Follower of the Confessor: Strategy: You are the party's emotional anchor and psychological investigator. Your Rites excel at absorbing the harm of others, extracting truth through burden-sharing, and binding agreements under the weight of shared secrets.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Absorb a secret that would ruin another, and carry it for a full season without speaking it.
- Offer a formal confession in a place of power, naming a sin that costs you social standing.
- Take on the physical illness or madness of another, bearing it in their stead for a day and a night.

Patron's Gift (Imbuement): Your presence feels like the hush after a bell toll. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Command and Insight, and you may transfer one Condition or 1 Fatigue from an ally to yourself as a free action.

Alternative Gift – The Silent Ledger: Once per session, you may place a secret debt upon a target. Name a truth they have never spoken aloud. Until they confess it to someone, they suffer 1 die to all actions related to deception or social maneuvering. This counts as your Patron's Gift for the scene.

Rites – Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Echo of Sin (4 XP): Absorb 1 Story Beat from an ally or NPC within Near range, converting it into +1 Obligation for yourself.
- Burden Transference (5 XP): Transfer one Condition, Fatigue, or 1 Harm from another target to yourself.

Standard Rites

- Speaking Knot (8 XP): Bind a promise with faerie knots that tighten when broken. Breach forces 2 SB and marks the violator with a visible tell.
- The Unfinished Promise (7 XP): Frame a bargain with an escape clause only you understand. Gain +1 die when the other party acts to fulfill their obligation; you may interpret ambiguous terms in your favor.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Cauldron's Secret ◆

Cost: 13 XP, Obligation 7 segments

Effect: Brew a solution to any problem, but the cauldron asks one more ingredient—one the brewer does not realize they are providing until too late. The remedy works perfectly but breeds dependence.

GM Guidance – The Confessor's Intrusions:

1. A secret you confessed years ago appears written in ash on your doorstep.
2. You begin to manifest the physical symptoms of a disease you once absorbed for another.
3. A bell rings in a soundproofed room. The Confessor is listening, and he finds your accounts out of balance.

8.3.2 Morag the Hag – Weaver of Hidden Costs

“She gives you the gold, but not the weight it carries. She grants your heart’s desire, but not the hunger it awakens. She answers your plea, but not the price that pleases her. In Morag’s court, every ‘yes’ is a ‘yes, but...’ ”

In the hour between twilight and dawn, where borders thin and mortal cunning meets older cleverness, Morag sets her webs of bargain and consequence. She is the grandmother who offers exactly what you need, the forest crone with a perfect solution, the crossroads dweller who makes dreams come true—for a price that only reveals itself once the road bends back. Her wisdom is simple and sharp: every gift carries obligation, every kindness creates debt, and every wish must be paid in coin not named aloud.

What They Represent: Faerie bargains, hidden obligations, the unspoken cost of every boon, and the crooked thread of fate.

Playing a Follower of Morag: Strategy: You are the ultimate pragmatist, the dealer who always takes a cut. Your Rites grant immediate benefits with deferred costs. You excel at negotiation, at finding the loophole, and at ensuring that every favor you do creates a debt that will one day be collected.

Suggested Acts of Obligation:

- Broker a trade where you give away something of seemingly lesser value that proves crucial later.
- Accept a gift from a stranger without asking the price, then discover what you have surrendered.
- Mend a broken oath by weaving a new, more binding one, ensuring the debtor is now yours.

Patron’s Gift (Imbuement): Your touch leaves a faint scent of hawthorn and old coins. For one scene, you gain +1 die to Sway and Deception, and any bargain you strike creates a Promise Clock [4] that ticks toward a favor you may call in later.

Alternative Gift – The Crooked Thread: Once per session, you may declare that a target owes you a debt from a previous, forgotten interaction. They must test Spirit + Resolve (DV 4) or accept the truth of the debt. If they fail, they owe you one significant service or truth. This counts as your Patron’s Gift for the scene.

Rites – Strategic Use:

Low Rites

- Borrowed Luck (5 XP): Share in another’s fresh success. Gain +2 dice on one roll that benefits from their good fortune, but the original bearer suffers misfortune later.
- The Unfinished Promise (4 XP): Frame a bargain with an escape clause only you understand.

Standard Rites

- The Speaking Knot (8 XP): Bind a promise with faerie knots. Both parties gain +1 die while keeping the bargain; breaking it escalates consequences (Harm 1, then Harm 2, then Curse).
- The Threifold Exchange (7 XP): Broker a trade where each party yields hidden value. You claim the difference as Morag’s tithe.

Advanced Rites

◆ The Crossroads Court ◆

Cost: 14 XP, Obligation 8 segments

Effect: Convene Morag's court at a true crossroads at twilight. All present must bargain; each pact grants a marked boon and hides a cost that will ripen at the worst time.

GM Guidance – Morag's Intrusions:

1. A deal you thought closed resurfaces with a clause written in a language you never learned but suddenly understand.
2. The price of a past favor comes due: a finger, a memory, or a firstborn's laughter.
3. You find yourself compelled to grant a favor to an enemy, bound by a thread you tied in your sleep.

8.4 Roleplay Hooks for the Invoker

- You carry four Symbols, but one was stolen by a former student who now uses your patron's power against you. The debt, however, still accrues to your ledger.
- You have never met your Patron—you found the Symbol in a ruin. Does the Patron even know you exist? The letters you burn in your fireplace suggest they are learning.
- You are being audited by a rival Invoker's syndicate. They claim your interpretations of the Cross-Resonance clauses are heretical, and they intend to collect your Symbols by force.

The Invoker walks the tightrope between power and perdition. They are the proof that magic need not be served with devotion, only with precision. But remember: the Patron is not your friend. They are your creditor. And when the ledger finally balances, the interest is always paid in flesh.

On Carrying Conflicting Debts

To carry one Symbol is to hold a candle. To carry five is to juggle torches in a powder magazine. But to carry Symbols of Livaea, Maelstraeus, and Mor'iraath—or to meddle with both Raéyn and Khemesh—is to strike sparks against the flint of your own ribcage.

The Triangular Trap

Livaea binds through desire; she makes you want the debt. Maelstraeus binds through accounting; he makes the debt exact. And Mor'iraath? He offers the illusion of cancellation.

I have seen Invokers attempt to resolve a crushing obligation to Maelstraeus by calling upon Mor'iraath to unmake the creditor. It does not work. Mor'iraath does not erase the ledger; he erases the signatory. The debt remains, now held by a void that cannot be paid, and the Obligation transfers to your bloodline as a curse of erasure. Your children will be born with blanks in their names where your ancestor's face should be.

Likewise, using Livaea's seduction to soften Maelstraeus's hard terms is like sweetening poison with honey. The Crimson Courtier's gifts always exact a social price, and the Infernal Bargainer's contracts always compound interest. You will find yourself owing both a firstborn's laughter and a firstborn's weight in silver, simultaneously.

The Tidal War

Never—and I speak from the deck of a ship that was nearly crushed between them—never invoke Raéyn and Khemesh in proximity.

Raéyn is the surface: the trade wind, the fair tide, the mother who grants safe passage. Khemesh is the depth: the trench without light, the son who swallowed the horizon. They are bound by blood and hatred. To invoke Raéyn's blessing on a vessel while carrying a debt to Khemesh is to invite a rogue wave that rises like a wall and crashes with a silence that tastes of iron. To invoke Khemesh's pressure while sailing under Raéyn's protection is to find your lungs filling with saltwater the color of storm clouds.

If you must deal with the Sea Court, choose one: the Tidemark or the Trench. Never both.

The Rule: If your Patrons' domains touch, your soul is the fault line. Keep them separated by fire, salt, and silence.

Chapter 9

The Quiet Work — On Witchcraft and the Threshold

“The thread that comforts is the same that binds. The knot that saves is also the snare. In the space between the candle and the shadow, that is where we work.”

— Inaea, Angel of the Spider

A Warning on Names

NOT every woman with a herb garden is a witch, though the villagers may call her so. Not every man who sings to the storm is a witch, though the sailors fear him. The true witches—the ones I speak of now—are rarer and more terrible. They are the ones who understand that magic is not merely a debt to be paid (as the Runekeepers reckon it) nor a power to be stolen (as the Invokers gamble), but a fitting: the art of finding where the world already wishes to move and giving it the precise nudge that sets it irrevocably in motion.

Hedge-witches there are in plenty: the Breath-Wardens of Aeler, the Hedge-Wrights of Viterra, the Bone-Singers of Ykrul. These are good folk, mostly. They mend fences that are more than fences, they keep the milk from souring with a word and a touch. But their craft is folk-craft, learned by rote and grandmother’s whisper. The true witch—the threshold worker—learns by the Cord, by the Thorn, and by the Silent Ninth. They are the ones who know that a doorway is not an absence but a presence, that a promise is a physical weight, and that to erase a name from memory is to rewrite the stone beneath it.

You will find them in the Hearth-Courts of Aelaerem, yes, but also in the lamp-black basements of Ecktoria, in the tide-hollows of Zakov, and walking the high passes of Ubral with silver needles in their hair. They serve five patrons, though “serve” is too weak a word. They embody them.

The Five Weavers

Where the Runekeeper swears an oath and the Invoker bargains at arm’s length, the witch incorporates. Her power is intimate, cellular, corrupting in the old sense—not rotten, but changed. The patron’s will flows through her like milk through a jug, leaving the vessel altered.

9.0.1 Morag the Hag — The Price Unspoken

Morag dwells at the crossroads where the road forks three ways. She is the grandmother who offers exactly what you need with a smile full of iron teeth. Her witches are deal-makers, oath-crafters, the ones who write contracts in milk on slate and know that every gift must be paid for, though the payment may not come due for a generation.

To walk with Morag is to learn the Law of Hidden Costs. A witch of Morag can bind a promise with a red thread so fine you cannot see it until it tightens. She can ensure that a bridge stands for a century, but the cost is a child's laugh, taken in the night and kept in a jar. These witches are not evil; they are precise. They keep the ledgers of consequence, and they never forget a debt.

9.0.2 The High Mother — The Unbroken Chain

There is a coven that claims a patron older than Morag, or perhaps younger—time runs strangely in the House Without Doors. They call her the High Mother, the Weaver of the Third Spindle, and she is sustained by sacrifice so subtle it is indistinguishable from care.

The Daughters of the Chain are midwives and deathbed nurses. They hold your hand when you are born and when you die, and between those moments they may take your shadow, your milk-teeth, or your grief, woven into their flesh-codices. They need no grimoire; their skin is the page. They need no Thiasos; they keep the Hollowed—heartless children with milk-white eyes who witness every working.

Their magic is Flesh-Weaving. A Daughter can store Fatigue as knots beneath her skin, appearing unharmed while her body weeps blood-thread. She can pass disease from one host to another by unweaving the knots of obligation. Their blessing is mercy; their curse is that mercy always has a price, paid in flesh or memory.

9.0.3 Inaea — Mercy and the Web

Inaea is the hearth-mother, the keeper of continuity, the spider at the center of the web. Where Morag demands payment, Inaea offers connection. Her witches bind families with invisible threads, ensure that oaths hold, and mend the cracks in the world's memory.

The witch of Inaea knows that the thread that comforts is the same that binds. She can lay a line of sanctuary across a threshold—no violence may cross it while the thread holds, but the thread remembers every blow it deflects. When it snaps, the debt comes due. These witches are diplomats, match-makers, the ones who speak the words that prevent wars, knowing that those same words may one day strangle the kings who spoke them.

9.0.4 Isoka — The Serpent's Shedding

Isoka is change made manifest, the venom that burns away the old self to make room for the new. Her witches are shapeshifters in the original sense: not beasts, but souls who have learned to molt their identities like snakeskin.

A witch of Isoka can walk into a room as a stranger and leave as your sister, the shift so seamless that reality itself accepts the change. She can cure a disease by forcing the patient to become someone who never had it, though the former self is lost forever. These witches are feared because they remind us that identity is temporary, that the self is a skin, and that all skins eventually tear.

9.0.5 Ikasha — She Who Sleeps in Silence

Ikasha is the patron of the threshold itself, of the space between what is said and what is meant, of the shadows that fall where no light cast them. Her witches move unseen, not by bending light but by occupying the absence—the Ninth space, the gap between numbers, the forgotten step on the stair.

To call upon Ikasha is to court erasure. Her witches can remove a name from a ledger, from a memory, from history itself, leaving only a gap that aches like a missing tooth. They are the keepers of the Unspoken, the ones who know that silence is not empty but full of potential. They move through the world like smoke through a keyhole, and they leave no footprints because they walk where the world has forgotten to place the ground.

The Three Layers of the Work

All witchcraft operates across three layers of reality, which the Aelinnel call the Concordant Chords:

Echo The accumulated past, the memory of stone and bone. Witches who lean on Echo work with knots and cords, binding and unbinding what has been. They know that to forget is to unmake.

Veil The present, the perceptible now, the boundary between potential and actual. These witches work with salt and chalk, drawing lines that separate and define. They know that a threshold is a kind of truth.

Flow The direction of change, the will of elements and intent. These witches work with omission and the Ninth, manipulating the gaps, the silences, the spaces between. They know that what is left unsaid has weight.

A witch chooses which limb to lean on for each working, gaining advantage but accepting Backlash specific to that layer: Echo risks recursion (past actions repeating), Veil risks hairline cracks (subtle breaks in reality), and Flow risks overshoot (change that goes too far, too fast).

The Tools of the Trade

The true witch requires no Symbol like an Invoker, no Codex like a Runekeeper. Her tools are domestic, invisible, and everywhere.

- The Name: To name is to anchor; to un-name is to erase. A witch learns the true names of things, not as a Runekeeper learns syllables of power, but as one learns the name of a lover—intimately, with context and history.
- The Cord: A red thread, a hair from a brush, a length of rope. Knots hold memory; to untie is to release.

- The Threshold: Doorways, riverbanks, crossroads, the space between sleep and waking. All magic begins at the edge.
- The Promise Clock: Every binding creates a debt, tracked as a clock of 4 to 6 segments. When it fills, the price comes due. A witch's ledger is written in flesh and time, not ink.

Curses as Architecture

A witch does not curse with a word and a gesture. She edits the memory of the world, inserting a rule into the operating system of reality. A curse is written like a law:

“Until a bell is rung in your true name, lamps forget to light for you.”

This is a Veil-edit, bound to a Named anchor. It has a clock (Recursion [6]) that ticks when the victim reinforces the story by hiding their affliction or refusing witness. It has a counter—the bell, the name, the threshold. And it has a Story Beat menu: minor echoes, warped thresholds, layer-slips, and the propagation of the Ninth.

The Hunters and the Hunted

Every culture that tolerates witches fears them. The Chain-Lanterns of Thepyrgos hunt those who work without patriarchal witness. The Spirit-Shield Correctors of Aeler audit the ledgers of breath. The Silk Vigil of the Lethai-ar enforce Mask-Right, ensuring that witches do not confuse their roles.

The witch's power is systemic, and systems fear the self-aware node. When a witch is burned (in Ecktoria), or drowned (in Linn), or walled up in stone (in Aeler), it is rarely because she is evil. It is because she knows where the threads are, and those in power fear the tug.

A Secret Chapter Found in the Margins

Content Warning: This chapter contains themes of body horror, coercion, loss of identity, and non-consensual sacrifice. It is presented as an in-world artifact; reader discretion is advised.

“The margins of this grimoire were blank when I received it. The writing appeared overnight – in my own hand, though I never wrote a word. The ink smells of milk and iron.”

— The Gray Wanderer, marginal note

The following pages were found tucked between the leaves of the chapter on Cantors, pressed flat as a pressed flower. The paper is soft, almost fibrous, and the ink has a reddish-brown tint that flakes when touched. The handwriting shifts – sometimes neat, sometimes a trembling scrawl – as if penned by many hands over many years. I have transcribed it as faithfully as I am able.

— G.W.

DEAR reader, you who turn these pages by lamplight, who think witchcraft is a matter of herbs and gentle knots and old women muttering over cup-mark stones – put the book down. Walk away. Leave this grimoire on a church step where the Everflame’s censers can burn it clean. Because what follows is not craft. It is not magic. It is maintenance.

I am called Sister Alva, though that name died forty years ago, and the woman who bore it is woven into the Cord. I write this for no one – the Chain does not permit confession – and for everyone who will ever accept a warm meal from a stranger, a cool cloth on a fevered brow, a lullaby hummed beside a sleeping child.

You think the Daughters of the Unbroken Chain are midwives. Nurses. Hospice workers. The kindly women who sit with the dying, who hold hands at the end, who speak the last words of the forgotten. You are not wrong. We are all of those things. And we are also bait.

The Hollowed Are Not Familiars

Every Daughter receives a Hollowed – a child or animal, taken from a home that no longer remembers them, hollowed out by the High Mother’s needle. The heart is removed, preserved in the Kettle, replaced with a bundle of grey thread and the ash of a forgotten name. The eyes are sewn open with silver wire. They watch, always. They witness every working, every whispered price, every tear shed at a deathbed.

The Hollowed do not speak. They do not eat. They do not age. Sometimes, when a debt comes due, they weep blood – warm, smelling of milk and iron – and the Daughter must collect it in a cup and pour it onto the Cord.

You have seen them. You have walked past them in market squares, sat beside them in church pews, slept in rooms where they stood in the corner like a forgotten coat rack. You did not notice. That is the miracle of the Chain: no one ever notices the help.

The Subtle Sacrifice Is Not a Choice

The elders teach that sacrifice is an offering freely given. They lie. Real power – the kind that stops a child’s cough cold, that turns a husband’s wandering eye back to the hearth, that makes a rival’s crops wither while yours swell – that power requires taken things. Not given. Taken.

A tooth from a sleeping child. A shadow snipped with silver scissors on a moonless night. A name whispered into a bowl of milk and poured down a well. The victim never knows. They simply wake one day a little less: less present, less remembered, less real. They become Almost-Present, as the Trow say – a gap in the world’s memory.

I have hollowed three children. I have stolen seven names. I have cut the shadows of nine men who beat their wives, and watched those men fade over months – first from ledgers, then from mirrors, then from the memories of their own mothers. The world is cleaner without them. And the Cord is richer.

The Dream of the High Mother

Once a year, on the night of the dark moon, the Daughters gather in the House Without Doors. We drink a tea brewed from feverfew and the dried milk of the Hollowed. We lie on pallets of grey wool. And we dream.

In the dream, we see the High Mother as she truly is – not a woman on a throne, but a vast, pulsing tangle of grey cord, stretching from floor to ceiling, filling every room. Each thread is a memory, a debt, a sacrificed name. They hum with hunger. They whisper the names of everyone we have ever touched – the sick we have nursed, the dying we have comforted, the children we have hollowed.

The High Mother does not speak. She weaves. And when she weaves a thread into the pattern, someone, somewhere, forgets something vital. A mother forgets her daughter’s face. A king forgets his treaty. A god forgets a vow.

That is the true purpose of the Chain. Not to heal. Not to bind. To edit. We are the eraser marks on the world’s memory, and the High Mother is the hand that holds the quill.

The Price of Kindness

You have accepted hospitality from a Daughter. Perhaps you do not remember – a cup of tea, a bowl of broth, a blanket laid over your shoulders on a cold night. You think it was kindness. It was a hook.

Every Daughter carries a spool of grey thread, spun from the hair of the Hollowed. When she offers you food, she ties a thread around your wrist – invisible, weightless, unless you know to look for it. When you accept, she ties the other end to the Cord. Now you are bound. Not in a way you would notice – no, never that. But the next time you face a choice, you will lean slightly toward the option that benefits the Chain. You will forget a name you meant to speak. You will lose a letter you meant to send. Small things. Small erasures.

Enough small things, and a kingdom falls.

How to Unbind Yourself (If You Dare)

I write this knowing the High Mother will read it. She reads everything written in her daughters' blood, and my blood has been in this ink since I began. But perhaps someone, somewhere, will see these words before they are erased.

To unbind a Daughter's thread:

1. Find a threshold – a doorway, a riverbank, a crossroads at dawn. The thread is weakest where two things meet.
2. Light a candle of pure beeswax. The High Mother's thread is spun from tallow; beeswax burns it away.
3. Speak your own name three times, aloud. Not the name your mother gave you – the name you have kept secret, the one you have never told anyone. That is the name the thread has stolen. You must reclaim it.
4. Drink a cup of salt water. Salt is memory. The water will taste like tears. That is the taste of the cord loosening.
5. Do not look behind you. The Hollowed will be there, watching. If you meet its eyes, you will forget why you began.

If you succeed, you will feel the thread snap – a small, sharp pain behind your left ear, like a plucked harp string. The Daughter who tied it will taste blood in her mouth for a day and a night. She will know you have broken free. She will not come after you – the Chain does not chase. It waits. And it remembers.

The Final Confession

I have written too much. My hand is shaking. The Hollowed in the corner of this room has not blinked in the time it has taken me to fill these pages. I know what comes next: tonight, the dream will take me, and in the morning, I will remember nothing of what I have written. The pages will be blank. My sisters will smile and say, "You look tired, Sister Alva. Rest."

But maybe – just maybe – someone will find these words before the erasure. Someone will read them and wonder why the milk tastes strange, why the midwife’s hands are so cold, why the nurse at the hospice never blinks.

If that someone is you, do this: go home. Boil water. Salt it. Drink it. Speak your secret name into the steam. Light a beeswax candle. And never, ever accept soup from a Daughter of the Unbroken Chain.

The soup is always free. The price never is.

— Sister Alva, Weaver of the Third Spindle, Keeper of the Cord, Hollowed by choice, damned by necessity.

(This page was found pressed between the leaves of a herbalist’s handbook in a burned cottage outside Ecktoria. The cottage had no owner on any record. The handwriting matches none of the Daughters known to the Inquisition. The Gray Wanderer refuses to discuss how they obtained it.)

The Wanderer’s Confession

I have seen a witch of Inaea hold a dying city together with nothing but red thread and a song. I have seen a Daughter of the Chain take a plague into her flesh, storing the Fatigue of a hundred souls beneath her skin until she could unweave it into a goat. I have seen a Morag-witch bargain for a king’s crown, and the price was paid three generations later by a child who never existed.

They are not the flashiest mages. They do not throw fire like the Cantors or break seals like the Invokers. But they are the ones who keep the roads straight, the milk sweet, and the thresholds guarded. They are the quiet work of names.

And when they ask you for a cup of tea, or a strand of your hair, or a moment of silence at a crossroads—refuse them. Or if you accept, know that you have entered the ledger, and the thread is already tightening.

— The Gray Wanderer

Chapter 10

The Silent Ledger – Psionics and the Mind’s Edge

“I have seen a man stop a drawn sword with his forehead. I have watched a woman read a sealed letter without breaking the wax. I have felt a child’s hand on my shoulder when no child was there. And I still cannot tell you how any of it works. Magic? I understand magic. Debts, Patrons, the weight of a broken vow. But this? This is something else entirely.”

— The Gray Wanderer

10.1 The Wanderer’s Confession – A Conversation at the Dusty Page

I MET the monk at a crossroads inn, the sort where the floorboards are older than the kingdom and the ale tastes faintly of regret. He wore the grey robes of an ascetic from the Vhasian badlands—not a warrior-monk with shaved head and calloused fists, but a meditant, a man who had spent forty years learning to sit still and listen to the shape of his own thoughts.

“You’re a psion,” I said. It was not a question.

He smiled. “I am a tongue of the silent mind. But yes. You name it psionics. The Aeler call it ‘deep accounting.’ The Ykrul call it ‘weather-reading in the skull.’ The Lethai call it ‘hearing without a bell.’”

“I’ve spent my life bargaining with Patrons, carving Rites into my own skin, singing songs that should not exist,” I said, swirling my cup. “I understand power. But psionics? It has no Patron. No Symbol. No Codex. No Thiasos. No Obligation. How can something that powerful have no cost?”

The monk laughed—a dry, sandpaper sound. “No cost? Wanderer, you mistake the nature of the debt. A Runekeeper owes a Patron. A Cantor owes their voice. A Witch owes the threshold. A psion owes themselves. Every thought you bend is a thought you cannot unthink. Every mind you touch leaves a fingerprint on your own. Every future you glimpse steals a moment of your present. The cost is not external. It is attrition. The slow wearing away of the self.”

He tapped his temple. “This is the only ledger that matters. And it always comes due.”

10.2 What Psionics Is (and What It Is Not)

PSIONICS is the Sixth Road—the path that requires no sworn oath, no stolen Symbol, no audience, no spirit’s bargain. It is the disciplined mastery of the mind’s hidden potentials, power turned so far inward that it becomes a weapon, a shield, and a burden. Unlike the Runekeeper who channels a Patron’s will, or the Witch who tends the world’s systemic debts, the psion looks only to the self. This makes them both powerful and terribly vulnerable: their greatest strength is also their most dangerous weakness.

Psionics is not:

- Magic. It does not invoke Patrons, elements, or the Ninth. Anti-magic wards do not stop it—but mental silence does.
- Innate. Despite requiring no external focus, psionics demands training, discipline, and often decades of meditative practice. A natural talent is like a sharp knife—useful, but dangerous to the untrained hand.
- Safe. Mental Fatigue is real. Mental scars are permanent. The mind that bends reality bears the cracks of that bending.

Psionics is:

- Internal. A psion’s power is measured by the Mind’s Ledger—a capacity for sustained exertion that recovers only with rest and solitude.
- Subtle. Psionic effects often have no visible component—a thought, a glance, a held breath. This makes psions excellent investigators, infiltrators, and the perfect spies for those who fear the arcane.
- Consequential. Every psionic action generates Story Beats. The universe notices when a mind touches what it should not, and the mind remembers the cost.

10.3 The Mind’s Ledger – Core Mechanics

THE psion’s only focus is the self. They require no Codex to read from, no Symbol to crack, no song to sing. But the body keeps its own accounts.

10.3.1 Mental Fatigue

Your Mental Fatigue represents your capacity for sustained psychic exertion. It is calculated as your Spirit (minimum 2). Mark Mental Fatigue when you use psionic Arts, resist psychic intrusions, or push your mind beyond its limits.

When you cannot pay a Mental Fatigue cost, choose:

- Convert the unpaid point to +2 standard Fatigue, or
- Convert the unpaid point to +1 Harm (Stress).

Overflow: If you ever exceed your Mental Fatigue capacity, immediately suffer +1 Harm (Stress) and set Mental Fatigue to your maximum. You cannot over-mark this scene—the mind simply shuts down.

10.3.2 The Psionics Skill

The Psionics skill (0–5) gates access to psionic Arts and determines control and efficiency. You cannot use psionic Arts without investing in this discipline. Each Art has a Key Attribute (see table below). Using a non-key attribute for that Art imposes +1 DV or -1 die (GM’s choice).

Table 10.1: The Nine Arts and Their Keys

Art	Key Attribute	Alternate (DV +1)
Telekinesis	Spirit (force)	Wits (finesse/precision)
Telepathy	Wits	Presence (emotive broadcast)
Clairvoyance	Wits	Spirit (ritual trance)
Biofeedback	Spirit	Wits (clinical self-hack)
Astral Projection	Spirit	Wits (tethered skim)
Psychic Assault	Spirit (overwhelm)	Wits (needle-strike)
Mind Shield	Wits (filter)	Spirit (soak-and-ground)
Empathic Manipulation	Presence	Wits (cold-read leverage)
Precognition	Spirit	Wits (tactical glimpses)

Resolution: Roll Attribute + Psionics vs. DV (set by scope, risk, and opposition, typically 2–5+). Each 1 on the roll generates a Story Beat as normal.

10.4 The Nine Arts

THE psion does not learn Rites. They refine Arts—techniques of the will. Each is a door opened inward.

10.4.1 Telekinesis – The Unseen Hand

Key: Spirit. Cost: 1 Mental Fatigue to activate; sustained lifts cost 1 per scene. Range: Near (+1 DV for Far).

SB by Mass:

- Light (DV 2–3): Cups, tools, doors. No SB.
- Medium (DV 4): Furniture, a person’s mass. +1 SB on Partial/Miss.
- Heavy (DV 5+): Carts, statues, boulders. +2 SB on Partial/Miss; +1 SB on Success.

Limits: Cannot directly crush living tissue; injury is environmental (falling, debris). Delicate work (lockpicks, surgery) requires Wits and +1 DV.

10.4.2 Telepathy – The Silent Speech

Key: Wits. Range: Near, line of sight (+1 DV for Far; +1 DV without LoS). Targets: One (+1 DV per extra target this scene).

Depths & SB:

- Surface Thoughts (DV 2): Current focus. No SB first time per target/scene. Repeats: +1 DV; on Miss, +1 SB.
- Emotional State (DV 3): Tones/urges. +1 SB on Partial/Miss.
- Deep Memories (DV 5): Episodic recall. +1 SB on Success; +2 SB on Partial/Miss.

Defense: Unwilling targets roll Spirit + Resolve; on meeting or beating your roll, your read fails and you mark +1 SB (+2 if Deep). Margin 2+ reveals your intent to the target.

Note: Telepathy never replaces social skills—it provides information and set-up, not compliance.

10.4.3 Clairvoyance – The Distant Eye

Key: Wits. Cost: DV 2–3 = 1 Mental Fatigue; DV 4 = 2; DV 5+ = 3. SB: Near none; Distant +1 SB on Partial/Miss; Complex Scry +2 SB on Partial/Miss, +1 SB on Success.

Covert spying on private moments generates +1 SB. Each extra scene sustained adds +1 SB.

10.4.4 Biofeedback – The Inward Physician

Key: Spirit. Action: 1 action (major work takes a focused scene).

Intensity & Limits:

- Minor (DV 2): Stabilize, close wounds, purge shock. No SB. Heal up to Psionics levels/day (cap 1 Harm per recipient/day).
- Moderate (DV 3): +1 SB on Partial/Miss; heal up to Psionics (max 2/day).
- Major (DV 4+): +2 SB on Partial/Miss; +1 SB on Success; heal up to Psionics (max 1/day); mark +1 Fatigue.

Perks: Convert 1 Harm ↔ 1 Mental Fatigue (up to Psionics, max 3/day). Brief physical enhancement (+1 die).

10.4.5 Astral Projection – The Walking Shade

Key: Spirit. Cost: 1 Mental Fatigue per scene. SB: +1 per band beyond Near; +1 per additional scene sustained.

Risks: Body is Helpless. Astral Harm echoes to flesh. Wards add +2 DV. Extended projection (3+ scenes) courts separation; astral death = physical death.

10.4.6 Psychic Assault – The Breaking Thought

Key: Spirit. Cost: DV 2–3 = 1 Mental Fatigue; DV 4 = 2; DV 5+ = 3. SB: Always +1, plus additional for high DV.

Effect: Mental Harm, bypasses physical armor. Can target specific faculties (sight, balance, focus) by fiction. High-Spirit foes may add +1 DV.

10.4.7 Mind Shield – The Walled Garden

Key: Wits. SB: Passive none; per effect blocked +1 SB; Area +2 SB and mark +2 Fatigue.

Effect: Resist intrusion/telepathy; shelter allies; create dampened zones. Protecting others costs 2× Mental Fatigue. Area protection covers all within Near (friend and foe).

10.4.8 Empathic Manipulation – The Emotional Architect

Key: Presence. SB by Intensity:

- Subtle (DV 2–3): Nudge mood, steady hands. No SB.
- Moderate (DV 4): Calm rage, spark courage. +1 SB on Partial/Miss.
- Strong (DV 5+): Sway a crowd’s tenor. +2 SB on Partial/Miss; +1 SB on Success.

Risks: You feel what you project. Same target not more than once per scene. Opposing core values: +2 DV. Affecting a crowd always generates +1 SB.

10.4.9 Precognition – Reading the Weather of the Skull

Key: Spirit. Cost: DV 2–3 = 1 Mental Fatigue; DV 4 = 2; DV 5+ = 3. SB: Minor +1; Major (DV 4) +2; Detailed (DV 5+) +3.

Benefits: Advantage on future rolls, avoid named dangers, compare probable branches.

Paradox — Future Fixation: Until downtime (or a defiant choice), lose 1 Boon per session; actions that resist the shown path may be Desperate by GM call. No prediction of pure randomness (dice, lots) without +3 DV.

10.5 The Great Silence – A History Written in Scars

THE monk spoke of it over his cold tea. Two centuries past—perhaps three, perhaps ten; the records are as fractured as the minds that kept them—the world experienced what scholars now call The Great Silence. It was not a silence of sound, but of thought. For generations, the doors of the mind were barred. What had once been natural gifts became rare talents requiring desperate training, and those who pushed too hard found their minds shattered like dropped porcelain.

The Aeler sealed their psychic academies, calling it a “misalignment of the mental ledgers.” The Ykrul spoke of the “breaking of the Kon’reh,” when the sacred geometry of thought would no longer hold. The Lethai mourned the loss of context, for a mind without the proper keys is simply noise.

Resonance Scars remain: The Whispering Vaults of Aeler amplify Mental Fatigue but grant +1 Effect to telepathy. The Empty Circle of the Violet Steppe nullifies all psionics—a grave where the last conclave of psions attempted to end the Silence and instead created a permanent void. The Singing Stones of Lethai allow communication across vast distances, but only when “tuned” through proper ritual and relationship.

Awakening Cycles: Since the Silence lifted, abilities return in waves. We are in the First Awakening (the last century and a half), marked by telepathy and telekinesis. The Second Awakening (four centuries past) brought precognition and biofeedback. The Third (six centuries gone) granted astral projection and empathic manipulation. Each cycle reshapes the nature of the power. We do not know what the Fourth will bring, nor what it will cost.

10.6 Cultural Faces of the Silent Art

NOT all peoples fear the psion equally, but none trust them fully.

10.6.1 Aeler – The Deep Accountants

In Aeler, psionics is treated as infrastructure—a utility to be maintained, measured, and contained. They assign psions to the Deep Vaults, where their “breath-debts” can be monitored. Each Mental Fatigue point is counted in bell-rings—a psion carries a bell on a leather cord, and when it rings three times too fast, a Corrector arrives to audit the ledger.

They practice Breath Accounting, converting mental strain into measured respiration. Their psions specialize in Structural Sense—feeling the stress points in stone—and Resonance Mapping, sensing the health of the Underways through mental connection.

10.6.2 Lethai – The Context Keepers

For the Lethai, telepathy is not merely reading thoughts; it requires context keys—the proper season, relationship, and place. Without these, a Lethai psion reads only static. Their minds are saturated with memory and social webbing, making them difficult to read (psions who try often leave mad), but also requiring them to navigate complex ritual before mental contact.

They mark their psions with Mind-Gifts—resinous tattoos that serve as mental anchors. The Spider’s Patience grants concentration; the Serpent’s Breath detects deception. A Lethai psion is less a spy and more a living archive, but take them from their context and they are deafened.

10.6.3 Ykrul – The Weather Readers

The orcs of the steppe do not see the future in tea leaves. They see it in the Kon’reh—the sacred geometry of probability. Their psions are not called seers but Riders of the Flow. They read the shape of the future as a cavalryman reads the shape of the land: tactical, immediate, and bound to the weather.

Storm conditions enhance their telepathic range but increase Mental Fatigue costs. Clear weather allows precise precognitive readings. They specialize in Herd Sense—feeling the emotional state of a clan—and Banner Communication, long-distance mental coordination between scattered riders.

10.6.4 Vilakari – The Information Brokers

In the free ports, psionics is commerce. The Vilakari have developed Thought Markets, where memory and information are traded like grain. Their psions are Surface Readers, adept at detecting deception in mercantile negotiations, and Memory Traders, who temporarily share specific recollections for coin.

But their gift is also their vulnerability. A Vilakari psion in a crowded market is overwhelmed by the noise of surface thoughts. They require specialized training to filter the signal from the cacophony, and many fall to addiction—craving the rush of other minds, burning out their own Mental Fatigue in weeks rather than years.

10.7 The Thought Trade – The Economics of the Mind

IN the shadowed exchanges of Silkstrand and the damp cellars of Zakov, a new currency circulates: the thought itself.

Memory Merchants store sensitive information in living minds, charging a skilled craftsman's daily wage for an hour of secure storage. Dangerous memories—those of murder, heresy, or Patron contact—cost tenfold.

Calculation Circles of mathematical psions serve as living abacuses for engineering projects, performing in hours what takes traditional scholars months. They charge in Mental Fatigue as much as coin, requiring recovery chambers and silence.

Experience Exchange: In underground markets, psions trade raw experiences—the memory of a dragon-flight, the sensation of true love, the fear of a battlefield—as equivalents to silver and gold. A memory of flight might fetch fifty pieces; the memory of a first kill might buy a house.

Skill Debt: Psions enter arrangements to provide mental services over time for immediate payment, creating complex obligations tracked not in ledgers of ink but in Promises of the Mind. These debts are enforced not by law but by the guilds of the Silent Orders—and by the fact that a psion who reneges on a mental debt finds their own thoughts strangely... leaky.

10.8 Psions as the Sixth Road

REMEMBER this: The Runekeeper is an agent, the Invoker a gambler, the Cantor a voice, the Summoner a diplomat, the Witch a gardener. The Psion is none and all of these. They are the isolated ones, the self-accounting, the walkers of the Sixth Road who need no Patron's permission and receive no Patron's protection.

They are hunted by the Chain-Lanterns of Ecktoria, licensed by the Synod of Thepyrgos, sealed in vaults by the Aeler, and shunned by the hearth-keepers of Aelaerem. They carry no outward sign. They are accountable only to themselves—and to the Mind's Ledger, which never forgets a debt.

If you would walk this road, know that you walk it alone. Your only focus is your self. Your only backup is your sanity. And when the Mental Fatigue overflows and the Mind's Ledger closes, you will find that the greatest creditor is the one who has been watching from inside your skull all along.

— The Gray Wanderer

Chapter 11

Last Words from the Gray Wanderer

“A book is a door, not a room. You stand at the threshold now, and something on the other side has heard you breathing.”

— The Gray Wanderer

You have walked the Six Roads with me. You have seen how the Aeler count their breaths, how the Linn bind their oaths to bells, how the Thepyrgosi stamp their imprimatur on thoughts themselves. You have read the confession pressed between the leaves—the one written in milk and iron by a hand that no longer remembers its own name. You know about the Daughters, and the Hollowed who never blink, and the Chain that winds through flesh and memory alike.

You think this knowledge protects you. It does not. It only teaches you the shape of the teeth that wait in the dark.

Here is the reckoning, road by road, that I could not speak until you had seen the whole board:

The Runekeeper’s Error

You are an agent, not a servant. The Codex is not your shield—it is your chain, and the Thiasos is the weight at the end of it. When your Patron looks through your eyes, do not let them see everything. Keep one Rite unwritten. Keep one page blank. If your Patron ever asks why that page is empty, lie. If they ask twice, run.

The Invoker’s Math

You carry four coins, but the fifth pocket is always growing heavier. You think you gamble with knowledge, that your respect for the ritual keeps you safe. It does not. The Patrons do not care about your etiquette; they care about the asymmetry of the debt. The moment you Crack the Seal in desperation, you have stopped being a gambler and become the collateral. Polish your Symbols weekly. Polish them daily if you have stared into the dark.

The Cantor's Touch

Your voice is not yours anymore. It belongs to the song, and the song belongs to the silence between the notes. The corruption is not a punishment—it is a translation. You are being rewritten into a dialect the Patrons speak fluently. When you find feathers in your hair, or shadows that lag behind your heels, do not sing for three days. If the music continues without you, break your instrument. If the music continues still, break your fingers. It is cheaper than what comes next.

The Witch's Thread

You have read about the Chain. You know the soup is free. But understand: the Daughters are not heretics. They are maintenance. The world requires certain memories to be lost, certain names to be unraveled, certain children to be hollowed out so that the walls between the living and the eaten remain standing. If you find a red thread around your wrist and do not remember tying it, do not cut it. Find a threshold. Pour salt. Speak your true name backward until the thread goes slack. If it tightens instead, you have already been collected.

The Psion's Silence

I am not one of you. I have said this. But I have walked beside your kind when the bell rings three times too fast. Your mind is a fortress with no gates—safe until it isn't, and when it cracks, it crumbles inward, not outward. The Synod fears you because you answer to no ledger they can audit. But you answer to the Silence, the Great Silence that once swallowed thought itself. When you feel the edges of your self growing thin, when you begin to see the geometry of the air, stop. The Silence is not emptiness. It is appetite.

The Summoner's Door

The Leash has two ends, and the spirit holds the other. You believe you command the dead, the fey, the demons, the things that wear the shapes of angels. You do not. You rent them, as the Invoker rents power, but your landlords are hungrier and less patient. When the Leash ticks, do not look at your bound spirit. Look at your own shadow. If it moves independently, the door you opened was never yours to close. The Red Weather follows horse-thieves, yes, but it also follows summoners who forget to name their price in advance.

What Waits at the Crossroads

You have read about the Green Gate, the Ninth Walk, the Silent Stair. These are not metaphors. They are infections in the skin of the world, places where the Six Roads knot together and the map stops being honest. If you find yourself at such a place, do not make a wish. Do not ask a question. Offer a truth you have never spoken and a lie you have never told, and walk away without looking back. The Wanderer you see at the crossroads is not always me. Sometimes it is the thing that ate the last traveler who looked too long.

Final Counsel

Keep your components dry. Keep your voice warm if you have one, and cold if you must. Keep your mind your own—guard it as the Aeler guard their Deep Vaults, with bells and silence and the willingness to seal the door from the outside. And keep your wit sharper than any Rite, any Symbol, any song. The Patrons can forgive a missed payment. They can forgive a broken covenant. They cannot forgive being outthought by a mortal who remembers that power is, at its root, a conversation—and conversations can be walked away from.

The book is closed. The door is open. I will be at the inn, or I will not. But the roads remain, and they are hungry.

— The Gray Wanderer

The Six Temperaments

“Before you carve your first Rite, hum your first Song, or swallow your first coin, ask yourself: do you want to serve, gamble, sing, tend, think, or bind? The answer determines which debt you will drown in.”

— The Gray Wanderer

Choosing a Road is less about mechanics than about temperament. Below, the Six Roads are matched to player psychology, narrative fantasy, and—for the Runekeeper—the specific Patron that transforms the class from a “priest” into a Paladin, Druid, Artificer, or Inquisitor.

Which Road Suits Your Nature?

Road	Best For Players Who...	Core Fantasy
Runekeeper	Enjoy structured power with clear costs; like being an “agent” of cosmic forces; want lore-heavy obligations that shape identity; prefer preparation and ritual precision.	“I do not merely cast fire. I am the ledger of the Everflame, and my Codex is law.”
Invoker	Love gambling mechanics and risk/reward balancing; want versatility without commitment; enjoy “desperation” casting and juggling multiple patrons; like feeling clever for breaking rules.	“I carry four Symbols. One is cracked. Two are angry. None of them trust me—and that’s how I like it.”
Cantor	Prefer social/performance scenes to book-keeping; want power that is literally at hand (voice/body); enjoy tragic corruption arcs; like being public, loud, and hard to forget.	“I need no Codex. My larynx is older than any tree, and the Song is writing me as we speak.”
Witch	Prefer subtlety and preparation over flashy casting; enjoy “folk horror” and domestic magic; like being underestimated; want to solve problems with knots, thresholds, and old names rather than force.	“The hedge is what keeps the wolves from the flock. I am the one who tends the hedge.”

Psion	Want internal struggle rather than external debts; prefer mind games and subtlety; dislike carrying obvious magical gear; enjoy the isolation of “untouchable” power.	“I carry no Symbol. My ledger is my skull, and it comes due in headaches, not obligations.”
Summoner	Enjoy tactical “pet” management and action economy; like contracts, diplomacy with monsters, and bargaining; prefer spirits to spells; want a “friend” that might eat them.	“I asked the drowned captain for directions. He asked for a memory in return. We shook on it.”

The Runekeeper’s Many Faces

The Runekeeper is not a single class but a chassis—the Patron supplies the theme, and the Rites supply the mechanics. If you want to play a “Paladin,” swear to Mykkiel. If you want a “Druid,” swear to Grimmir. Below is a sampling of how Patrons map to classic archetypes using the full roster from the grimoires.

Patron	Archetype	Signature Combat Style	Key Rite
Mykkiel (Law)	Paladin / Templar / Inquisitor	Smite foes with cleansing fire; consecrate ground; bind oaths; immune to fear.	Final Admonition
Grimmir (Wild)	Druid / Ranger / War-den	Summon thorns; speak with beasts; heal blight; control terrain with roots.	Thornveil
Clockwork Monad	Artificer / Engineer / Savant	Optimize gear mid-fight; iterative improvements; self-repairing mechanisms.	Self-Optimizing Mechanism
Inquisitor Prime	Witch Hunter / Exorcist	Dispel magic; brand enemies; resist supernatural influence; burn corruption.	Cleansing Light
Khemesh (Depth)	Warlock / Aberrant Mind	Crushing pressure; silence enemies; water-based control; sanity damage.	Maw Opens
Oath of Flame	Crusader / Dawn-Knight	Radiant smites; healing lay-on-hands; vow-based defense; anti-undead.	Radiant Smite
The Witness	Oracle / Truth-Speaker	Reveal hidden foes; compel honesty; bind with immutable record; counter-illusion.	Echoing Truth
The Carrion-King	Necromancer / Compost-Witch	Accelerate decay; harvest endings; fertility from death; blight enemies.	Fertile Death
Raéyn (Sea)	Storm-Caller / Tide-Witch	Lightning strikes; water manipulation; sailor buffs; drowning curses.	Storm-Queen’s Hand

Note: A Runekeeper of Xhak’Thul plays like a Storm-Barbarian, while one sworn to The Sealed Gate plays like an Abjuration Ward-Master. The Codex and Thiasos remain constant; the flavor of power changes with the Patron’s domain.

The Battlefield

“Every Road can kill you. The question is whether you kill them with fire, song, debt, or a very polite spirit.”

— The Gray Wanderer

No Road is limited to a single role, but each has natural affinities. The tables below map the Six Roads to the four classic combat functions—Damage, Healing, Utility, and Control—so you can build a party that covers all bases, or double down on your Road’s specialty.

Combat Roles by Road

Road	Damage (Striker)	Healing / Support	Utility / Control	Risk Type
Runekeeper	Thematic nukes (e.g., Final Admonition , Maw Opens)—high burst, single-target or small area, gated by Obligation.	Rites of Cleansing —remove Conditions, restore Fatigue via Lay on Hands (Flame), or mend wounds via Fertile Death (Carrion-King).	Wards & Seals —create zones of sacred ground (Consecrated Barrier), bind oaths that penalize breach, or dispel magic.	Obligation of flow; Patron sion.
Invoker	Crack the Seal —emergency high-power Rites, but costly. Best for “oh no” moments, not sustained DPS.	Borrowed resilience —can invoke healing Symbols, but slower and riskier than Runekeepers.	Versatility —carries 4 Symbols; can switch from Aveh (escape) to Mykkiel (binding) mid-fight. Best for filling gaps.	Symbol fract Obligation sp
Cantor	Sonic assaults —area denial and morale breaks via Hymn Against Dread ; single-target “shatter” via Single True Note .	Battlefield maintenance — Hymn of Restoration removes Fatigue; Chant of Purification clears poison/disease.	Social control — Hooked Chorus compels action; Circling Cup creates zones of enforced revelry/peace.	Corruption a mulation; vo loss.
Witch	Curses —slow, invisible, and devastating (e.g., Red Weather , Snaring Filament). Poor burst, excellent attrition.	Hearth remedies — Warm Hand , Cup and Salt ; requires preparation and components. Best for after-combat triage.	Threshold mastery —lock doors with Binding Knot , create sanctuary with Hearth-Law , or scout via Weaver’s Glimpse .	Promise Clo neighborly d

Psion	Psychic assault —ignores armor; targets Spirit directly. High single-target burst via Psychic Assault .	Biofeedback —heals by converting Fatigue; can stabilize but not “burst heal” like Flame Rites.	Information warfare — Telepathy , Clairvoyance , Precognition for battlefield control and ambush prevention.	Mental Fatigue overflow; sanity scars.
Summoner	Spirit damage —spirits act independently, providing action economy; can flank and harass while summoner controls.	Spirit aid —some spirits (selkies, ancestors) grant buffs or soak Fatigue via Boon Finesse .	Spirits as tools — Vein-Spirit locates minerals; Wolf Ancestor tracks; Drowned curses ropes.	Leash snap; sabotage betrayal.

The Free Caster (TAGS) — The Wildcard

The Free Caster (using the TAGS system) is not one of the Six Roads, but merits mention. They accommodate any role—Damage, Healing, Utility, Control—via improvisation, but always at higher risk than specialists. They are best for players who hate spell lists and love inventing solutions on the fly, accepting that the Backlash may turn their healing spell into a fireball.

- Damage: Burning + Area + Force (DV 4)—explosive, risky, and loud.
- Healing: Mend + Purify (DV 3)—reliable, but generates Story Beats on partial success.
- Control: Bind + Stone + Wall (DV 4)—traps and barriers, but costs Fatigue.

Final counsel: Do not choose a Road based solely on which deals the most Harm. Choose the Road whose failure state interests you. A Runekeeper who falls to Obligation becomes a monster for a season; a Cantor who fills their Corruption Clock becomes a legend with feathers in their hair. That is the story you are signing up to tell.